Mr. Petschnikoff has a technic that is colossal, and there are no difficulties known to the violin which he does not seem to master with the utmost ease. His tone is also most beautiful in quality and on the artistic side he was admirable in every way.

And so it can be said that the performance was one of the few memorable ones, and that another great violinist has appeared among us. Mr. Petschnikoff received an immense ovation, being recalled many times. It was a well-merited triumph.

The orchestra gave a superb performance of the ever beautiful "unfinished" symphony of Schubert's, and Grieg's new orchestral "Symphonic Dances," Op. 64, heard here for the first time, were also finely performed. It was an enjoyable concert from beginning to end.

1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The thirteenth Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Violin, No. 2, in D major, opus 35.
Grieg: Symphonic Dances, opus 64.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Alexandre Petschnikoff was the violinist.

Schubert's symphonic torso was all that saved it from being a "local color" programme through and through. Although the extreme young Russian party look askance upon Tchaikovsky, as too German to deserve the nation's homage as a "national" composer, he is surely quite Russian enough for most of us; and there is no "timid Scandinavianism" about Grieg! Indeed, it was he who invented the expression, as a warning to his compatriots not to follow Niels Gade in the Mendelssohn direction.

Perhaps Schubert's unfinished symphony comes up a bit oftener than in its turn at our concerts. This is likely to be the case when a great composer has left only two viable symphonies; one or the other of them must be given, to keep his name on the active list, so that both are in danger of being overworked. Still damnable reiteration is no very safe means of keeping a great master's place warm in the public heart; and a monotonous alternation between two works is liable to make him seem more tedious than if ten or twenty of his compositions were given in a single season. Could not the "Fierrabras" overture do duty now and then, as a means of keeping Schubert's charter valid? It has not been heard here for some years. As for the performance of the two movements on Saturday evening, that was masterly, in every respect ideal.

Grieg's new symphonic dances are so very idiomatic in their Scandinavianism that one almost needs a dictionary to find out what they mean. Surely these Norsemen are working bravely to prevent music's being an universal language; they are quite as bent upon it, in their way, as the Russians are, and with somewhat better success. Very likely a born Norwegian or Dane may be able to see some variety of matter in Grieg's works; but to us, to whom his idiom is exotic, he seems to have been saying the same thing over and over again ever since his opus 1. I do not know what Scandinavian bird takes the place of our eagle in Norway; but, whatever its species may be, Grieg keeps making that unhappy fowl scream with a relentless pertinacity of patriotism, and it always screams the same old tune. These dances are symphonic in the French sense only; they are written for orchestra. They are four in number, all in exactly the same form—if the first part is major, the second is minor in the same key, and vice versa—and all deadly dull. They have gone on record, which was perhaps more than they deserved; let us hope that it is on the record of deaths.

Mr. Petschnikoff comes to us with a resounding reputation from across the water. As a technician he is probably to the violin today what Rosenthal is to the pianoforte. The latter travels with a metronome, and, when he has failed to push the weight down a notch farther in twenty-four hours, feels, like Titus, that he has lost a day. Mark Twain, in his account of a trip up the Mississippi in a slow steamer, says: "We had some excitement, now and then, racing with islands." Rosenthal has a more thrilling time of it: he passes his life in racing with a metronome. I do not know whether Mr. Petschnikoff keeps a metronome or not, but I have my suspicions. After all, I have no business to speak of Mr. Petschnikoff's technique; it all seems very wonderful to me, but modern technique on all instruments has reached such a pitch of wonder that it takes a specialist rightly to appreciate it in any given case. His tone is beauty itself; but here, too, I cannot speak with authority, I cannot tell how much of it is his own, and how much his violin's—for he plays on one of the most famous Stradivari in the world, an instrument with a reputation longer than his own. I can only speak of the musical impression he made upon me. And, with all my dumb astonishment at his technique and delight in his tone, I can find little else to enjoy in his playing. To be sure, he is a Russian, playing a Russian concerto, in presumably the Russian way: with tremendous dash and vigor of accent in rapid passage-work, with infinite poignancy of expressiveness in sustained cantilena. What he gives may be, for aught I know, the quintessence of Samoeidic musical feeling. But, to my un-Slavic ears, it all sounds dreadfully like what we tame occidentals have been accustomed to call acrobatic outrageousness and thoosy-moosy vulgarity. Tchaikovsky, as a Russian, may mean, and like, to have his melodies phrased that way; all I can say is that, applied to any other music, such melodic phrasing would be nothing but bad. Worst of all, Mr. Petschnikoff did not succeed in making the concerto itself seem musically worth while. It seems, upon the whole, pretty poor stuff. And the result? The result was that Mr. Petschnikoff whipped the audience up to the wildest pitch of enthusiasm; he was applauded and recalled as if the people could not make up their minds to see the last of him. One could fancy Ole Bull nodding a benediction from his grave!

The next programme is: Chadwick, Avonais elegiac overture (first time); Fuchs, serenade for strings, No. 1, in D major; Wagner, entra'acte, etc., from act III. of "Die Meistersinger;" Beethoven, symphony No. 8 in F major, opus 93. W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL AGE.
CONDUCTED BY HARRY EDWARD FREUND

NEW YORK, JANUARY 25, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

Début of Ludwig Breitner.

AT Carnegie Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, January 17, and Thursday evening, January 18, 1900, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts of unusual merit and attractiveness.

At the Wednesday matinée a marked feature was the production of a new symphony, "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark, a New Yorker by birth, and a nephew of Carl Goldmark, the well-known composer. It proved to be a work of spirit and originality, the admirable themes skilfully orchestrated. The symphony suite, "Scheherezade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was the other orchestral feature of the program.

LUDWIG BREITNER.

The soloist of the concert was Ludwig Breitner, the pianist, who made his début in Edward Schutts' second pianoforte concerto. Mr. Breitner's style combines sentiment with brilliancy. He suggests the pianist Pugno in certain points, but has ample originality of his own. His performance was warmly appreciated and heartily applauded. He enjoyed the advantage of having a superb Steinway Grand on which to play.

Ludwig Breitner was born in Trieste and studied in Milan. Then he was brought to the notice of Hans Von Bülow, who advised him to go to Vienna and study with Rubinstein. Calling on that master he was told to learn Chopin's D flat major sonata, and return with it in eight days. His performance of this work interested Rubinstein so much that he personally undertook his tuition for the next three years. Then Breitner studied for six months with Liszt, and under his direction played at a concert one of the Hungarian fantasias with orchestra. He played also in St. Petersburg with Rubinstein, who dedicated to him one of his compositions. Since that time Breitner has been heard in Berlin, Moscow, Paris, London, and the leading English towns. At Paris he appeared at the Pasdeloup and Colonne concerts, and founded, two years ago, a Philharmonic Society, which has presented several admirable programs.

At the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were played Brahms' "Tragic" overture, two movements from Moszkowski's suite in F major, and a notable symphony by César Franck, a work interesting in construction and development. It includes three long movements. Franck's music has lately been pushed forward both here and in France, and is attracting more attention now than it did during the lifetime of the composer, who died in 1890, in his 78th year.

Schumann-Heink had been announced to sing at this Symphony concert, but she was ill, and her place was taken by Mlle. Olitzka.

BOSTON POST
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 28, 1900.
(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

PETSCHNIKOFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Great Russian Violinist Scorcs a Success Before Boston Audience.

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.
The Russian violinist, who played at the Symphony yesterday.

The feature of the thirteenth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was the playing of Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, who made his first appearance in Boston on this occasion. He comes here with a great European reputation. His selection was Tschaikowski's second concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Op. 35.

Mr. Petschnikoff has a technic that is colossal, and there are no difficulties known to the violin which he does not seem to master with the utmost ease. His tone is also most beautiful in quality and on the artistic side he was admirable in every way.

And so it can be said that the performance was one of the few memorable ones, and that another great violinist has appeared among us. Mr. Petschnikoff received an immense ovation, being recalled many times. It was a well-merited triumph.

The orchestra gave a superb performance of the ever beautiful "unfinished" symphony of Schubert's, and Grieg's new orchestral "Symphonic Dances," Op. 64, heard here for the first time, were also finely performed. It was an enjoyable concert from beginning to end.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 29, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The thirteenth Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Schubert: Unfinished Symphony in B minor.
Tchaikovsky: Concerto for Violin, [illegible] 2, in D major, opus 35.
Grieg: Symphonic Dances, opus 64.
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Alexandre Petschnikoff was the violinist.

Schubert's symphonic torso was all that saved it from being a "local color" programme through and through. Although the extreme young Russian party look askance upon Tchaikovsky, as too German to deserve the nation's homage as a "national" composer, he is surely quite Russian enough for most of us; and there is no "timid Scandinavianism" about Grieg! Indeed, it was he who invented the expression, as a warning to his compatriots not to follow Niels Gade in the Mendelssohn direction.

Perhaps Schubert's unfinished symphony comes up a bit oftener than in its turn at our concerts. This is likely to be the case when a great composer has left only two viable symphonies; one or the other of them must be given, to keep his name on the active list, so that both are in danger of being overworked. Still damnable reiteration is no very safe means of keeping a great master's place warm in the public heart; and a monotonous alternation between two works is liable to make him seem more tedious than if ten or twenty of his compositions were given in a single season. Could not the "Fierrabras" overture do duty now and then, as a means of keeping Schubert's charter valid? It has not been heard here for some years. As for the performance of the two movements on Saturday evening, that was masterly, in every respect ideal.

Grieg's new symphonic dances are so very idiomatic in their Scandinavianism that one almost needs a dictionary to find out what they mean. Surely these Norsemen are working bravely to prevent music's being an universal language; they are quite as bent upon it, in their way, as the Russians are, and with somewhat better success. Very likely a born Norwegian or Dane may be able to see some variety of matter in Grieg's works; but to us, to whom his idiom is exotic, he seems to have been saying the same thing over and over again ever since his opus 1. I do not know what Scandinavian bird takes the place of our eagle in Norway; but, whatever its species may be, Grieg keeps making that unhappy fowl scream with a relentless pertinacity of patriotism, and it always screams the same old tune. These dances are symphonic in the French sense only; they are written for orchestra. They are four in number, all in exactly the same form—if the first part is major, the second is minor in the same key, and vice versa—and all deadly dull. They have gone on record, which was perhaps more than they deserved; let us hope that it is on the record of deaths.

Mr. Petschnikoff comes to us with a resounding reputation from across the water. As a technician he is probably to the violin today what Rosenthal is to the pianoforte. The latter travels with a metronome, and, when he has failed to push the weight down a notch farther in twenty-four hours, feels, like Titus, that he has lost a day. Mark Twain, in his account of a trip up the Mississippi in a slow steamer, says: "We had some excitement, now and then, racing with islands." Rosenthal has a more thrilling time of it: he passes his life in racing with a metronome. I do not know whether Mr. Petschnikoff keeps a metronome or not, but I have my suspicions. After all, I have no business to speak of Mr. Petschnikoff's technique; it all seems very wonderful to me, but modern technique on all instruments has reached such a pitch of wonder that it takes a specialist rightly to appreciate it in any given case. His tone is beauty itself; but here, too, I cannot speak with authority, I cannot tell how much of it is his own, and how much his violin's—for he plays on one of the most famous Stradivari in the world, an instrument with a reputation longer than his own. I can only speak of the musical impression he made upon me. And, with all my dumb astonishment at his technique and delight in his tone, I can find little else to enjoy in his playing. To be sure, he is a Russian, playing a Russian concerto, in presumably the Russian way: with tremendous dash and vigor of accent in rapid passage-work, with infinite poignancy of expressiveness in sustained cantilena. What he gives may be, for aught I know, the quintessence of Samoeidic musical feeling. But, to my un-Slavic ears, it all sounds dreadfully like what we tame occidentals have been accustomed to call acrobatic outrageousness and thoosy-moosy vulgarity. Tchaikovsky, as a Russian, may mean, and like, to have his melodies phrased that way; all I can say is that, applied to any other music, such melodic phrasing would be nothing but bad. Worst of all, Mr. Petschnikoff did not succeed in making the concerto itself seem musically worth while. It seems, upon the whole, pretty poor stuff. And the result? The result was that Mr. Petschnikoff whipped the audience up to the wildest pitch of enthusiasm; he was applauded and recalled as if the people could not make up their minds to see the last of him. One could fancy Ole Bull nodding a benediction from his grave!

The next programme is: Chadwick, Avonais elegiac overture (first time); Fuchs, serenade for strings, No. 1, in D major; Wagner, entra'acte, etc., from act III. of "Die Meistersinger;" Beethoven, symphony No. 8 in F major, opus 93.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL AGE
CONDUCTED BY
HARRY EDWARD FREUND

NEW YORK, JANUARY 25, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

Début of Ludwig Breitner.

AT Carnegie Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, Jänuary 17, and Thursday evening, January 18, 1900, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave two concerts of unusual merit and attractiveness.

At the Wednesday matinée a marked feature was the production of a new symphony, "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark, a New Yorker by birth, and a nephew of Carl Goldmark, the well-known composer. It proved to be a work of spirit and originality, the admirable themes skilfully orchestrated. The symphony suite, "Scheherezade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, was the other orchestral feature of the program.

LUDWIG BREITNER.

The soloist of the concert was Ludwig Breitner, the pianist, who made his début in Edward Schutts' second pianoforte concerto. Mr. Breitner's style combines sentiment with brilliancy. He suggests the pianist Pugno in certain points, but has ample originality of his own. His performance was warmly appreciated and heartily applauded. He enjoyed the advantage of having a superb Steinway Grand on which to play.

Ludwig Breitner was born in Trieste and studied in Milan. Then he was brought to the notice of Hans Von Bülow, who advised him to go to Vienna and study with Rubinstein. Calling on that master he was told to learn Chopin's D flat major sonata, and return with it in eight days. His performance of this work interested Rubinstein so much that he personally undertook his tuition for the next three years. Then Breitner studied for six months with Liszt, and under his direction played at a concert one of the Hungarian fantasias with orchestra. He played also in St. Petersburg with Rubinstein, who dedicated to him one of his compositions. Since that time Breitner has been heard in Berlin, Moscow, Paris, London, and the leading English towns. At Paris he appeared at the Pasdeloup and Colonne concerts, and founded, two years ago, a Philharmonic Society, which has presented several admirable programs.

At the evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were played Brahms' "Tragic" overture, two movements from Moszkowski's suite in F major, and a notable symphony by César Franck, a work interesting in construction and development. It includes three long movements. Franck's music has lately been pushed forward both here and in France, and is attracting more attention now than it did during the lifetime of the composer, who died in 1890, in his 78th year.

Schumann-Heink had been announced to sing at this Symphony concert, but she was ill, and her place was taken by Mlle. Olitzka.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1900.

The Boston Symphony was warmly welcomed home again after its tour out of town, and Petschnikoff, the soloist of this concert, was received with wild enthusiasm. Details of his work have appeared so often in these columns that further comment is needless.

The Grieg Dances suffered from being much too long, although Gericke gave them spirit and dash enough to make them interesting under all conditions. The beauty of the Schubert Symphony, however, stood in bold and beautiful relief. The accompanist was not up to the usual standard, being a trifle heavy in the canzonetta and dragging in the finale.

The program was:

Unfinished Symphony	Schubert
Concerto for Violin, D major	Tschaikowsky
Symphonic Dances, op. 64 (First time in Boston.)	Grieg

The next program contains as the "clou" the Beethoven Symphony No. 8 and an overture of Chadwick besides.

Petschnikoff Carries Boston by Storm.

Alexandre Petschnikoff carried Boston by storm at his first appearance there last Friday and Saturday with the Symphony Orchestra. With the Tschaikowsky Concerto he made his art known to them, and the enthusiastic demonstrations of the most critical and conservative audiences in the United States were convincing testimony of their unqualified approval and profound appreciation. The Russian violinist thus added another to his already long list of invariable successes in this country, of which the critics make report as follows:

Mr. Petschnikoff has passion, he has intelligence, which holds his emotions in check, and he has artistic taste which holds him strictly to the work in hand. He has also brilliancy, which comes to him as an emotion. It is impossible to watch and to listen to him unmoved, for he is thoroughly absorbed in his work, puts his youthful vitality into it, and it reaches the hearer at fever heat.

The artist is also able to interpret sentiment and keep it free from sentimentalism; his style is marked with eagerness and dignity, and the tone he produces is rich, mellow and most agreeable. That he is amply equipped in the matter of technic goes without saying; but it is higher praise to dwell on the fact that he is an artist by instinct. —Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, January 27, 1900.

Alexandre Petschnikoff very quickly demonstrated that he is one of the foremost violinists of the day, and he convincingly showed his mastery of the instrument and his title to be ranked as a great artist. It was very evident that Petschnikoff was a sympathetic interpreter of his countryman's concerto, for the more highly colored and uncouth phrases and melodies were played with splendid verve and brilliancy, and roused the auditors to demonstrations of applause at the close, almost before the finale was ended.

His tone is full and of beautiful quality, a technic seemingly able to surmount any difficulty, and an ability to vary the color of his execution to suit the sentiments of the measures. His finger work in double and triple chords was particularly true in harmonic qualities, and, although the purity of the strenuous rhythms was specially noticeable, there was great beauty shown in the delicate and cantabile passages, which were beautifully sung by the strings under his control.

An unaccompanied cadenza in the first movement was played in a masterly manner, and in the second part the melancholy themes of the Slav composer were given with a breadth of sympathetic tone that resembled the notes of a 'cello.

At the close of the concerto the soloist was greeted with tremendous enthusiasm, being recalled to the platform many times.—Boston Globe, January 28, 1900.

Alexandre Petschnikoff has an exceedingly brilliant and fluent technic. The difficulties of the concerto are exacting to the highest degree. These the player met and conquered without apparent effort. He bows largely and freely, and his intonation is exquisitely pure and true. His audience went fairly wild over him, applauded tremendously and recalled him some half dozen times.—Boston Herald, January 28, 1900.

Mr. Petschnikoff's intonation was excellent; his tone was charming, his technic was fluent. The audience was pleased, and recalled him several times.—Boston Journal, January 28, 1900.

PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., January 8, 1900.

THE season has been so far a good one in regard to quality and quantity of musical affairs. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been here four times, but has not succeeded in increasing the number of its patrons. No doubt the price for the concerts has something to do with this. They would no doubt do better with six concerts instead of eight, as very many people go from here to Boston every Friday, and naturally do not care to hear the same program.

HOME JOURNAL
A PAPER OF TO-DAY
Vol. 56. SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1900. No. 2.

The sixth symphony concert at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday, which opened with Brahm's "tragic chorus," came very near having a tragic ending. An infernal machine exploded in the corridor during the playing of the fourth movement of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The loud playing of the orchestra made the noise of the explosion almost inaudible to all except those who sat on the side of the house near where it occurred. Some thought that a window had fallen or that a steam pipe had burst; while others maintained that the Boers were coming. It was only when the odor of powder became diffused through the house that the audience became anxious. The movement of the symphony which expresses a feeling of thankfulness after a storm was summarily interrupted and the vast audience streamed out with a feeling of thankfulness that nothing more serious happened.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Attractive Programme and a Fine Performance.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme, while lacking the brilliancy which has been a marked feature of the three preceding concerts, was a very attractive one, and the performance was thoroughly adequate and satisfactory. An audience of moderate size listened with pleasure and appreciation. Special points of interest were the production of a new work by a young American composer and the introduction of a hitherto unknown singer. The programme included the following numbers:

Overture, "Hiawatha" (MS. First Time.)	Rubin Goldmark
Aria, "La Captive"	Hector Berlioz
Two movements from Suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39	Moritz Moszkowski
II. Allegretto giojoso (D minor).
III. Tema con Variazioni; andante (A major).
Songs with pianoforte:
(a) "Von Ewige Liebe"	Brahms
(b) "Autumnal Gale"	Grieg
Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," op. 68	Ludwig von Beethoven
I. Allegro ma non troppo (F major).
II. Andante molto mosso (B-flat major).
III. Allegro (F major).
IV. Allegro (F minor).
V. Allegretto (F major).

Mr. Rubin Goldmark, the composer of the opening overture, is a nephew of the well-known German composer, Karl Goldmark, and was born in New York city in 1872. Taking up the study of music at an early age, he went abroad after leaving college and continued his studies in Vienna with Anton Door and the Fuchs brothers. On returning to America he was the recipient of further instruction upon the pianoforte by Joseffy, and in composition by Dvorak. At present Mr. Goldmark is director of a conservatory of music at Colorado Springs. Besides this overture, his largest work up to the present time, he has written a trio for piano, violin and 'cello, a sonata for piano and violin, a romanza for 'cello, and a theme and variations for orchestra, the latter having been afforded a hearing by the late Anton Seidl.

The overture "Hiawatha" is a work of considerable pretensions, and offers much both of merit and of promise. Just why it bears the title of "Hiawatha" must remain a matter of conjecture, for no attempt whatever has been made to afford "color" by the use of Indian melodies, as has so successfully been done by Macdowell and others. Perhaps the composer found his inspiration in Longfellow's poem, but without—or even with—the label the connection is not apparent to the hearer. It can only be criticised, then, purely from the musical standpoint. The work is unmistakably reminiscent, as must naturally be expected in the case of a young composer. Few are able to formulate a style of their own at the age of Mr. Goldmark. There is nothing in the overture to suggest plagiarism, but the style of the masters who have been diligently studied, and probably most admired, is insenbliby copied. The treatment is distinctly that of Wagner, with hints now and then of the latter-day composers of the romantic school. It seems well-nigh impossible for any young composer to escape the influence of the mighty Baireuth master. The work displays, however, both imagination and poetic fancy, and a thorough acquaintance with the art of musical workmanship. The themes are agreeable, if not of striking originality, and the instrumentation is that of a sure and practiced hand. There is plenty of contrast, of orchestral coloring, and of climaxes well led up to. Altogether, it must be called a pleasing work and one of considerable power. The future should certainly hold something in store for Mr. Goldmark.

The other orchestral numbers were the brilliant suite in F by Moszkowski and the familiar and ever welcome "pastoral" symphony of Beethoven. Both were played with the utmost finish and smoothness, and were received with evident pleasure, the suite, in particular, being accorded vigorous and prolonged applause.

The vocalist of the evening was Mme. Agnes Janson, a Swedish contralto of good reputation abroad, who made her first appearance in this city. Mme. Janson has a voice of large range and abundant power. The quality of tone is excellent in the upper and lower registers, but at times not so agreeable at points between, where she has a peculiar way of contracting the throat and then forcing the tone. The "yodeling" effect produced is one that seems to be in favor with Swedish singers, nearly all of whom display this peculiar habit. Aside from this Mme. Janson sang effectively, though the Berlioz aria which she chose for her first number is a vapid and thoroughly uninteresting work. Her songs with piano were well delivered and received warm recognition.

The fifth concert by the Symphony Orchestra will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 7.

The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 5, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Chadwick's "Adonais."

At the 13th symphony concert we were somewhat mystified by the annou[illegible] that an elegiac overture by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, entitled "Avonais," was to be given in the programme next succeeding. One could not help thin[illegible] it was a little late to write elegies about the Swan of Avon, as late as the tears which Mark Twain shed at the tomb of Adam. Last Saturday the mystery was cleared by correcting the misprint, and "Avonais" became "Adonais," the title under which Shelley sang the death of Keats.

Mr. Chadwick has by no means followed the poem, but, like the English writer, he pays his tribute to the Adonis-like fate of an unfortunate friend. Naturally, there is little to delight a general public in so earnest a subject, but the result is a composition that may be spoken of in the same breath with Brahms' "Tragic Overture." Shelley's thought, to learn in suffering what is taught in song, finds some exemplification here, and the "Pard-like spirit, beautiful and swift," is harried and pursued until

> "Life, like a dome of many-colored glass,
> Stains the white radiance of Eternity."

As regards the technical form of the work, the reviewer finds something that reminds of Schumann in the free return of part of the exposition at the close, and there is a solemnity not unlike that of Tschaikowsky in the gloomy tone-coloring, especially in the use of wind instruments. Skill in treatment is not lacking, but the contrapuntal work is not obtruded to the detriment of the psychological idea.

There is a Hellenic dignity throughout the overture, and the relentless scourging of the victim of Destiny is like the portrayal of an Orestes chased by the Furies, a Euripedean picture of human helplessness.

The number was played with appropriate nobility, and at its close the composer was given a very direct tribute of applause. We hope to hear the overture again, for we believe that it will gain by repeated audition, much as it impressed us at a first hearing. We think, however, that the adjective "elegiac" is misplaced in connection with the work.

The programme swept from grave to gay, with remarkable suddenness, for after this sober work there came continuous lightness. Fuchs's Serenade for string orchestra was the most innocuous sugarwater; at its highest point, in its adagio, it attained the genteel grief of Mendelssohn, while at its low-water mark, its minuet, one is tempted to paraphrase the old French critic and inquire, "Ce menuet, que me veutil?"

It was an easily digested omelette soufflee, but the critic cannot find a single peg in the whole series of five movements whereon to hang any descriptive remarks.

Wagner's prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers" blew Herr Fuchs away like a wreath of smoke. It was superbly played, and its picture of festive pomp gave another style of brightness to the programme which began in gloom.

Then came the finishing touch of joviality, in Beethoven's eights symphony, the jolliest of the nine. One cannot always find the height of humor in Beethoven; the man who gave his waiter a tepid soup shower bath in the Viennese restaurant, and who pelted a servant with stale eggs, was rather grotesque than dainty in his fun making.

Mendelssohn could teach all the great masters the art of musical persiflage, of refined wit in tones. But it is pleasant to watch a great composer at play, and even the most earnest of the galaxy have at one time or another descended to the realm of pure fun; Bach in his "Coffee Cantata" (most ponderous and Johnsonian of jokes), Brahms in his "Academic Overture," Mozart in his "Musikalischer Spass" (would we could hear this some day), and in dozens of other instances, and Beethoven in his sixth and eighth symphonies.

Beethoven had a very graphic word for his jovial and informal vein; he called it "aufgeknoepft,"—"unbuttoned,"—and there is a great deal of this unbuttoning in the symphony that was performed.

When the great symphonist was in this mood the bassoon became his favorite instrument, and this clown of the orchestra was almost always in the foreground with its antics, during the performance of the present work. The brusque octave cluckings of the first movement were duplicated in the comical duet of the bassoon and kettle-drum in the finale; the pretty little dialogue between violins and violoncellos in the Allegretto, which is the nearest approach to a slow movement in the symphony, was admirably executed; the capricious ending of this movement, the musical joke that puzzled Berlioz, was splendidly caught up.

This latter jest is exactly like the brusquerie of Heine in some of his poems, for example the one where he wishes that his verses were flowers that they might grow at the feet of his love, or sighs, that he might waft them to her, and finally, with ironic change of mood, that they were peas, that he might cook himself a good pea-soup!

The Minuet which follows is a playful antique, which lost nothing in the performance. It is the most square-cut of Beethoven's three symphonic minuets, the two others being Scherzo-movements in everything but name.

But the climax of animal spirits, of wild jollity, is in the finale. The whole orchestra trying to bully an innocent violin theme, is the first bit of fun; the sudden leap from flute to contrabass, from garret to cellar of the orchestra, and the union of bassoon and kettledrum (already alluded to), both in the coda, are the last. It was a purely orchestral concert and possibly it was wise to make it light and agreeable. Spite of the general lightness of the programme there was a sufficiency of contrast, and the list may be called a well-arranged one, maugre the diaphanous [illegible] the Serenade.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 35.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A New Overture by Chadwick Given for the First Time.

It Is a Work in Memory of Frank May Marshall—Fuchs' Serenade and Wagner Number Appreciated—Fine Interpretation of Fascinating Beethoven Symphony.

Last evening's programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was:

"Adonais," Elegiac overture (MS., first time.)	G. W. Chadwick
Serenade for string orchestra, No. 1, op. 9	Robert Fuchs
Entr'acte, dance of apprentices, procession of the Master Singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg"	R. Wagner
Symphony No. 8, in F-major	Beethoven

Mr. Chadwick's new overture was composed in memory of Frank May Marshall, who died in July, 1897. The overture bears the date Jan. 27, 1899. I arrived a few moments too late to hear the opening bars of the work, and in the possibility that I may have missed something of crucial importance to a full understanding of the composition, do not feel justified in attempting to form a conclusive judgment on it. From what I did hear, and it could not have been very short of the whole, it did not impress me as among the most felicitous of Mr. Chadwick's efforts in its kind. That it should be sombre was, of course, appropriate; that it should have been dull, was not imperatively necessary.

The instrumentation is less clear than that of the composer's earlier orchestral works, and there were moments when it seemed to be quite cloudy. Then, too, in its general characteristics it appeared to oscillate between Wagner and Grieg in point of style, with an unmistakable flavor of the "Tristan and Isolde" of the former now and then.

It would be superfluous, at this late date, to dwell upon the fine musicianship of Mr. Chadwick and his thorough mastery of the technique of his art. They are prominent in the overture; but the impression conveyed by a first hearing of it apparently indicated that he was not as fortunate as he usually is in his inspiration. However, a closer acquaintance with it may possibly change this opinion. At the close of the performance there was a vigorous round of applause and a call for Mr. Chadwick, who, it was understood, bowed his acknowledgments from his place among the audience.

The Fuchs serenade made its usual effect with its graceful melodiousness and the skill with which variety of effect and color was produced with the limited means at the composer's command. It was read and played in the most finished vein of both Mr. Gericke and his artists. The Wagner number was given throughout with splendid brilliancy, clearness and spirit; and also in a sympathetic feeling that brought out the effects with an emphasis wholly delightful.

The interpretation and performance of the always fascinating symphony accorded it the fullest justice possible. It was read along conventional lines, without any attempt to make the composer say more than he manifestly intended, but the presentation of the work was none the less classic and interesting on that account.

The programme for the next concert is: Haydn's "Oxford" symphony; "Medee," a suite for orchestra by D'Indy, and suggested by the tragedy of the same name by Catulle Mendez, which will be given for the first time here, and the closing scene from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung." The soloist is to be Fraulein Ternina, who will sing an aria yet to be named.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 31, 1900.

The Boston Symphony was warmly welcomed home again after its tour out of town, and Petschnikoff, the soloist of this concert, was received with wild enthusiasm. Details of his work have appeared so often in these columns that further comment is needless.

The Grieg Dances suffered from being much too long, although Gericke gave them spirit and dash enough to make them interesting under all conditions. The beauty of the Schubert Symphony, however, stood in bold and beautiful relief. The accompanist was not up to the usual standard, being a trifle heavy in the canzonetta and dragging in the finale.

The program was:

Unfinished Symphony..Schubert
Concerto for Violin, D major..........................Tschaikowsky
Symphonic Dances, op. 64..Grieg
(First time in Boston.)

The next program contains as the "clou" the Beethoven Symphony No. 8 and an overture of Chadwick besides.

Petschnikoff Carries Boston by Storm.

Alexandre Petschnikoff carried Boston by storm at his first appearance there last Friday and Saturday with the Symphony Orchestra. With the Tschaikowsky Concerto he made his art known to them, and the enthusiastic demonstrations of the most critical and conservative audiences in the United States were convincing testimony of their unqualified approval and profound appreciation. The Russian violinist thus added another to his already long list of invariable successes in this country, of which the critics make report as follows:

> Mr. Petschnikoff has passion, he has intelligence, which holds his emotions in check, and he has artistic taste which holds him strictly to the work in hand. He has also brilliancy, which comes to him as an emotion. It is impossible to watch and to listen to him unmoved, for he is thoroughly absorbed in his work, puts his youthful vitality into it, and it reaches the hearer at fever heat.
>
> The artist is also able to interpret sentiment and keep it free from sentimentalism; his style is marked with eagerness and dignity, and the tone he produces is rich, mellow and most agreeable. That he is amply equipped in the matter of technic goes without saying; but it is higher praise to dwell on the fact that he is an artist by instinct.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette, January 27, 1900.
>
> Alexandre Petschnikoff very quickly demonstrated that he is one of the foremost violinists of the day, and he convincingly showed his mastery of the instrument and his title to be ranked as a great artist. It was very evident that Petschnikoff was a sympathetic interpreter of his countryman's concerto, for the more highly colored and uncouth phrases and melodies were played with splendid verve and brilliancy, and roused the auditors to demonstrations of applause at the close, almost before the finale was ended.
>
> His tone is full and of beautiful quality, a technic seemingly able to surmount any difficulty, and an ability to vary the color of his execution to suit the sentiments of the measures. His finger work in double and triple chords was particularly true in harmonic qualities, and, although the purity of the strenuous rhythms was specially noticeable, there was great beauty shown in the delicate and cantabile passages, which were beautifully sung by the strings under his control.
>
> An unaccompanied cadenza in the first movement was played in a masterly manner, and in the second part the melancholy themes of the Slav composer were given with a breadth of sympathetic tone that resembled the notes of a 'cello.
>
> At the close of the concerto the soloist was greeted with tremendous enthusiasm, being recalled to the platform many times.—Boston Globe, January 28, 1900.
>
> Alexandre Petschnikoff has an exceedingly brilliant and fluent technic. The difficulties of the concerto are exacting to the highest degree. These the player met and conquered without apparent effort. He bows largely and freely, and his intonation is exquisitely pure and true. His audience went fairly wild over him, applauded tremendously and recalled him some half dozen times.—Boston Herald, January 28, 1900.
>
> Mr. Petschnikoff's intonation was excellent; his tone was charming, his technic was fluent. The audience was pleased, and recalled him several times.—Boston Journal, January 28, 1900.

PROVIDENCE.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., January 8, 1900.

THE season has been so far a good one in regard to quality and quantity of musical affairs. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been here four times, but has not succeeded in increasing the number of its patrons. No doubt the price for the concerts has something to do with this. They would no doubt do better with six concerts instead of eight, as very many people go from here to Boston every Friday, and naturally do not care to hear the same program.

HOME JOURNAL

A PAPER OF TO-DAY

Vol. 56. SATURDAY, JANUARY 13, 1900. No. 2.

The sixth symphony concert at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Thursday, which opened with Brahm's "tragic chorus," came very near having a tragic ending. An infernal machine exploded in the corridor during the playing of the fourth movement of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. The loud playing of the orchestra made the noise of the explosion almost inaudible to all except those who sat on the side of the house near where it occurred. Some thought that a window had fallen or that a steam pipe had burst; while others maintained that the Boers were coming. It was only when the odor of powder became diffused through the house that the audience became anxious. The movement of the symphony which expresses a feeling of thankfulness after a storm was summarily interrupted and the vast audience streamed out with a feeling of thankfulness that nothing more serious happened.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

PUBLISHED BY THE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Attractive Programme and a Fine Performance.

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. The programme, while lacking the brilliancy which has been a marked feature of the three preceding concerts, was a very attractive one, and the performance was thoroughly adequate and satisfactory. An audience of moderate size listened with pleasure and appreciation. Special points of interest were the production of a new work by a young American composer and the introduction of a hitherto unknown singer. The programme included the following numbers:

Overture, "Hiawatha".......Rubin Goldmark
(MS. First Time.)
Aria, "La Captive"...........Hector Berlioz
Two movements from Suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39...........Moritz Moszkowski
  II. Allegretto giojoso (D minor).
  III. Tema con Variazioni; andante (A major).
Songs with pianoforte:
  (a) "Von Eurige Liebe"............Brahms
  (b) "Autumnal Gale"..................Grieg
Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," op. 68..................Ludwig von Beethoven
  I. Allegro ma non troppo (F major).
  II. Andante molto mosso (B-flat major).
  III. Allegro (F major).
  IV. Allegro (F minor).
  V. Allegretto (F major).

Mr. Rubin Goldmark, the composer of the opening overture, is a nephew of the well-known German composer, Karl Goldmark, and was born in New York city in 1872. Taking up the study of music at an early age, he went abroad after leaving college and continued his studies in Vienna with Anton Door and the Fuchs brothers. On returning to America he was the recipient of further instruction upon the pianoforte by Joseffy, and in composition by Dvorak. At present Mr. Goldmark is director of a conservatory of music at Colorado Springs. Besides this overture, his largest work up to the present time, he has written a trio for piano, violin and 'cello, a sonata for piano and violin, a romanza for 'cello, and a theme and variations for orchestra, the latter having been afforded a hearing by the late Anton Seidl.

The overture "Hiawatha" is a work of considerable pretensions, and offers much both of merit and of promise. Just why it bears the title of "Hiawatha" must remain a matter of conjecture, for no attempt whatever has been made to afford "color" by the use of Indian melodies, as has so successfully been done by Macdowell and others. Perhaps the composer found his inspiration in Longfellow's poem, but without—or even with—the label the connection is not apparent to the hearer. It can only be criticised, then, purely from the musical standpoint. The work is unmistakably reminiscent, as must naturally be expected in the case of a young composer. Few are able to formulate a style of their own at the age of Mr. Goldmark. There is nothing in the overture to suggest plagiarism, but the style of the masters who have been diligently studied, and probably most admired, is insenbliby copied. The treatment is distinctly that of Wagner, with hints now and then of the latter-day composers of the romantic school. It seems well-nigh impossible for any young composer to escape the influence of the mighty Baireuth master. The work displays, however, both imagination and poetic fancy, and a thorough acquaintance with the art of musical workmanship. The themes are agreeable, if not of striking originality, and the instrumentation is that of a sure and practiced hand. There is plenty of contrast, of orchestral coloring, and of climaxes well led up to. Altogether, it must be called a pleasing work and one of considerable power. The future should certainly hold something in store for Mr. Goldmark.

The other orchestral numbers were the brilliant suite in F by Moszkowski and the familiar and ever welcome "pastoral" symphony of Beethoven. Both were played with the utmost finish and smoothness, and were received with evident pleasure, the suite, in particular, being accorded vigorous and prolonged applause.

The vocalist of the evening was Mme. Agnes Janson, a Swedish contralto of good reputation abroad, who made her first appearance in this city. Mme. Janson has a voice of large range and abundant power. The quality of tone is excellent in the upper and lower registers, but at times not so agreeable at points between, where she has a peculiar way of contracting the throat and then forcing the tone. The "yodeling" effect produced is one that seems to be in favor with Swedish singers, nearly all of whom display this peculiar habit. Aside from this Mme. Janson sang effectively, though the Berlioz aria which she chose for her first number is a vapid and thoroughly uninteresting work. Her songs with piano were well delivered and received warm recognition.

The fifth concert by the Symphony Orchestra will be given on the evening of Wednesday, March 7.

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 5, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Chadwick's "Adonais."

At the 13th symphony concert we were somewhat mystified by the announcement that an elegiac overture by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, entitled "Avonais," was to be given in the programme next succeeding. One could not help thinking that it was a little late to write elegies about the Swan of Avon, as late as the tears which Mark Twain shed at the tomb of Adam. Last Saturday the mystery was cleared by correcting the misprint, and "Avonais" became "Adonais," the title under which Shelley sang the death of Keats.

Mr. Chadwick has by no means followed the poem, but, like the English writer, he pays his tribute to the Adonis-like fate of an unfortunate friend. Naturally, there is little to delight a general public in so earnest a subject, but the result is a composition that may be spoken of in the same breath with Brahms' "Tragic Overture." Shelley's thought, to learn in suffering what is taught in song, finds some exemplification here, and the "Pard-like spirit, beautiful and swift," is harried and pursued until

> "Life, like a dome of many-colored glass,
> Stains the white radiance of Eternity."

As regards the technical form of the work, the reviewer finds something that reminds of Schumann in the free return of part of the exposition at the close, and there is a solemnity not unlike that of Tschaikowsky in the gloomy tone-coloring, especially in the use of wind instruments. Skill in treatment is not lacking, but the contrapuntal work is not obtruded to the detriment of the psychological idea.

There is a Hellenic dignity throughout the overture, and the relentless scourging of the victim of Destiny is like the portrayal of an Orestes chased by the Furies, a Euripedean picture of human helplessness.

The number was played with appropriate nobility, and at its close the composer was given a very direct tribute of applause. We hope to hear the overture again, for we believe that it will gain by repeated audition, much as it impressed us at a first hearing. We think, however, that the adjective "elegiac" is misplaced in connection with the work.

The programme swept from grave to gay, with remarkable suddenness, for after this sober work there came continuous lightness. Fuchs's Serenade for string orchestra was the most innocuous sugar-water; at its highest point, in its adagio, it attained the genteel grief of Mendelssohn, while at its low-water mark, its minuet, one is tempted to paraphrase the old French critic and inquire, "Ce menuet, que me veutil?"

It was an easily digested omelette soufflee, but the critic cannot find a single peg in the whole series of five movements whereon to hang any descriptive remarks.

Wagner's prelude to the third act of "The Mastersingers" blew Herr Fuchs away like a wreath of smoke. It was superbly played, and its picture of festive pomp gave another style of brightness to the programme which began in gloom.

Then came the finishing touch of joviality, in Beethoven's eights symphony, the jolliest of the nine. One cannot always find the height of humor in Beethoven; the man who gave his waiter a tepid soup shower bath in the Viennese restaurant, and who pelted a servant with stale eggs, was rather grotesque than dainty in his fun making.

Mendelssohn could teach all the great masters the art of musical persiflage, of refined wit in tones. But it is pleasant to watch a great composer at play, and even the most earnest of the galaxy have at one time or another descended to the realm of pure fun; Bach in his "Coffee Cantata" (most ponderous and Johnsonian of jokes), Brahms in his "Academic Overture," Mozart in his "Musikalischer Spass" (would we could hear this some day), and in dozens of other instances, and Beethoven in his sixth and eighth symphonies.

Beethoven had a very graphic word for his jovial and informal vein; he called it "aufgeknoepft,"—"unbuttoned,"—and there is a great deal of this unbuttoning in the symphony that was performed.

When the great symphonist was in this mood the bassoon became his favorite instrument, and this clown of the orchestra was almost always in the foreground with its antics, during the performance of the present work. The brusque octave cluckings of the first movement were duplicated in the comical duet of the bassoon and kettle-drum in the finale; the pretty little dialogue between violins and violoncellos in the Allegretto, which is the nearest approach to a slow movement in the symphony, was admirably executed; the capricious ending of this movement, the musical joke that puzzled Berlioz, was splendidly caught up.

This latter jest is exactly like the brusquerie of Heine in some of his poems, for example the one where he wishes that his verses were flowers that they might grow at the feet of his love, or sighs, that he might waft them to her, and finally, with ironic change of mood, that they were peas, that he might cook himself a good pea-soup!

The Minuet which follows is a playful antique, which lost nothing in the performance. It is the most square-cut of Beethoven's three symphonic minuets, the two others being Scherzo-movements in everything but name.

But the climax of animal spirits, of wild jollity, is in the finale. The whole orchestra trying to bully an innocent violin theme, is the first bit of fun; the sudden leap from flute to contrabass, from garret to cellar of the orchestra, and the union of bassoon and kettledrum (already alluded to), both in the coda, are the last. It was a purely orchestral concert and possibly it was wise to make it light and agreeable. Spite of the general lightness of the programme there was a sufficiency of contrast, and the list may be called a well-arranged one, maugre the diaphanous character of the Serenade.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 35.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A New Overture by Chadwick Given for the First Time.

It Is a Work in Memory of Frank May Marshall—Fuchs' Serenade and Wagner Number Appreciated—Fine Interpretation of Fascinating Beethoven Symphony.

Last evening's programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall was:

"Adonais," Elegiac overture..G. W. Chadwick
(MS., first time.)
Serenade for string orchestra, No. 1, op. 9.
Robert Fuchs
Entr'acte, dance of apprentices, procession of the Master Singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg"...........R. Wagner
Symphony No. 8, in F-major.........Beethoven

Mr. Chadwick's new overture was composed in memory of Frank May Marshall, who died in July, 1897. The overture bears the date Jan. 27, 1899. I arrived a few moments too late to hear the opening bars of the work, and in the possibility that I may have missed something of crucial importance to a full understanding of the composition, do not feel justified in attempting to form a conclusive judgment on it. From what I did hear, and it could not have been very short of the whole, it did not impress me as among the most felicitous of Mr. Chadwick's efforts in its kind. That it should be sombre was, of course, appropriate; that it should have been dull, was not imperatively necessary.

The instrumentation is less clear than that of the composer's earlier orchestral works, and there were moments when it seemed to be quite cloudy. Then, too, in its general characteristics it appeared to oscillate between Wagner and Grieg in point of style, with an unmistakable flavor of the "Tristan and Isolde" of the former now and then.

It would be superfluous, at this late date, to dwell upon the fine musicianship of Mr. Chadwick and his thorough mastery of the technique of his art. They are prominent in the overture; but the impression conveyed by a first hearing of it apparently indicated that he was not as fortunate as he usually is in his inspiration. However, a closer acquaintance with it may possibly change this opinion. At the close of the performance there was a vigorous round of applause and a call for Mr. Chadwick, who, it was understood, bowed his acknowledgments from his place among the audience.

The Fuchs serenade made its usual effect with its graceful melodiousness and the skill with which variety of effect and color was produced with the limited means at the composer's command. It was read and played in the most finished vein of both Mr. Gericke and his artists. The Wagner number was given throughout with splendid brilliancy, clearness and spirit; and also in a sympathetic feeling that brought out the effects with an emphasis wholly delightful.

The interpretation and performance of the always fascinating symphony accorded it the fullest justice possible. It was read along conventional lines, without any attempt to make the composer say more than he manifestly intended, but the presentation of the work was none the less classic and interesting on that account.

The programme for the next concert is: Haydn's "Oxford" symphony; "Medee," a suite for orchestra by D'Indy, and suggested by the tragedy of the same name by Catulle Mendez, which will be given for the first time here, and the closing scene from Wagner's "Die Gotterdammerung." The soloist is to be Fraulein Ternina, who will sing an aria yet to be named.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 4, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr Gericke's players had the program all to themselves at the symphony concerts last week. They presented a delightful, well-contrasted program, that both gained and deserved favor. No wonder that other cities, however they may rival one another in jokes at the hub's expense, agree in envying her the possession of such a corps of skilled musicians as the Boston symphony orchestra.

The program opened with a real novelty, the elegiac overture "Adonais," by Mr George W. Chadwick, as yet unpublished. Those who were familiar with Mr Chadwick's previous work for orchestra counted, as a matter of course, upon success for this work, which is dedicated to the memory of the composer's friend, Frank Fay Marshall, who died July 28, 1897. It has only its title and purpose, the program announced, in common with Shelley's poem. The elegiac character of the tone poem is maintained skilfully and effectively from the sighing theme with which the overture begins until the close. Every page of the manuscript gives proof of musicianly skill and true artistic feeling. There are to be noted certain methods that once or twice suggest Grieg and his treatment of the minor in his Norse music. On the whole, however, the work is marked by a distinct originality, as well as unity of treatment, that rank among the chief charms of the work. "Adonais," in brief, is worthy of Mr Chadwick's high reputation as a composer for orchestra.

Exceptionally bright and breezy, with characteristics that made for good humor and content, was Fuchs' serenade for string orchestra, No. 1 in D major, which was second on director Gericke's program list. Robert Fuchs is not a composer given to propounding and evolving musical enigmas, as are some of our latter-day composers. He never poses as a spokesman for Zarathustra, nor attitudinizes as one who has a dark, occult message to interpret by weird crashes of strange instruments. He is content with old ways of score-making. He delights in evoking melody and harmony. Not for him is any attempt to embody "the thingness of the here." His happy mission is to make cheery and efficient use of an orchestra, as the auditors of the serenade for strings can bear willing testimony.

The selections from Wagner's "Meistersinger," including the prelude to the third act, the apprentices' dance, the processional chorus and the glorious greeting to Hans Sachs, gave to orchestra and leader alike their most exacting tasks—and how finely they were fulfilled! The music was from the original score (the vocal parts of course being omitted) and the performance from first to last was a veritable triumph in tone painting—something to live long in memory.

Beethoven's symphony No. 8 in F major—as young, melodious and pleasing as when it was first heard in the concert room—ended the program and it was followed with delight by the audiences. Even at the rehearsal 99 out of every 100 auditors "staid through," and seemed to thoroughly enjoy the performance, which was throughout admirable.

Mme Ternina, the famous lyric contralto, is to sing at this week's symphony concerts. D'Indy's orchestral suite, "Medea," is to have its first hearing. The program will also present Hadyn's "Oxford" symphony, and the closing scene from Wagner's "Twilight of the Gods."

BOSTON POST, 8

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL FINANCES.

The report of the New Boston Music Hall for the year ending Jan. 1, 1900, shows:

Cash on hand, Jan. 1, 1899, $158; subscriptions to new stock, $198,200; miscellaenous, $2898; total, $201,257. Various expenditures, $6789; for construction, $103,788; cash on hand, $90,673; total, $201,257.

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at 320 Tremont building at noon, Feb. 21.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1900.

MUSIC HALL FINANCES.

Annual Report Made Public—Stockholders Will Vote This Month on Higginson Lease.

The report of the New Boston Music Hall for the year ending Jan. 1, 1900, shows:

Cash on hand, Jan 1 1899......		$158
Subscriptions to new stock....		198,200
Miscellaneous		2,898
Various expenditures...........	$6,789
For construction................	103,788
Cash on hand....................	90,673
Total	$201,257	$201,257

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at 320 Tremont Building at noon, Feb. 21. The main business will be to see whether the stockholders will ratify a lease, dated July 6, 1899, of real estate on Huntington Avenue to Henry L. Higginson, and will authorize an agreement with H. L. Higginson, et al., owners of adjoining land, arranging for projection of foundations on the estate of the latter.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. FEB. 4, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schubert left us only two movements of the unfinished symphony composed in 1822 and those were not published until after his death in 1828 There has been much speculation as to his reasons for not completing the other movement of which he left only nine bars. The explanation seems very clear after listening to the melancholy strains, whose sadness pervades even the allegro, and continues in the andante unbroken. One phrase in the allegro recalls the opening phrase of Haydn's "Spirit Song" and suggests to the imagination a soul's entrance into the grim halls of Fate, wherein however strenuous its struggles for love and happiness, both are forever denied. Under the empire of such oppressive thoughts there was no place for a gay and sportive measure. Schubert's life was heavy with unfulfilled aspirations, yet one of his biographers states:—"His power of creating was never cramped by the untoward events of his worldly position; in spite of bitter experiences he fulfilled his mission in the world gloriously, and found in the consciousness of his own value and the happiness of an inexhaustible source of invention, an abundant compensation for the absence or paucity of the good things of this life." Let us hope so, certainly, for the genius that can enrich the world with such heavenly music must have regions of content quite unknown to ordinary mortals. It was beautifully interpreted by the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's guiding hand, and was and always will be a delight to hear when so performed.

The concerto was given here in 1898 and played by the Russian violinist Brodsky as well as by Adamowski The former brought out the barbaric quality of the music which under Mr. Petochnikopp's hands took on a gentler character. This gentleman indeed while mastering every technical difficulty yet managed to make even the intricate cadenzas and violent bow-jumping, musical. His cantabile phrases were most alluringly delicate and smooth and his spirited rendering of the last movement quite electrifying as was proved by applause and the repeated calls he received. The Symphonic Dances were given for the first time and certainly led the instruments a dance if no more. The Norwegian [illegible] seem exactly ballabile, yet the whole effect is light and pleasing if not exactly gay.

[illegible] Elegiac Overture of Chadwick, heard for the first time, is, although not one of its composer's happiest efforts, nobly conceived and in its opening measures full of beauty. "Oh, weep for Adonais!" is the burden of its mournful strains and the instrumentation brings out the idea of lament, as well as rebellion at the cruel and untimely taking off of Adonais, the beautiful and beloved youth. It was carefully read and executed. The Serenade for strings by Fuchs is a most delightful work. The themes are melodious, well contrasted and developed. The allegro scherzando is full of gayety and the adagio a tranquilly flowing romance—while the finale with its dance rhythm in D minor changing to A major and finishing in D major closes the movement most inspiringly.

The entracte from the Meistersinger is so well known that comment is somewhat superfluous except as it regards the interpretation, which also needs only the remark that it was played in the usual unexcelled manner to which we are accustomed.

The symphony called by Beethoven a "Kleine Symphonie," and the last but one of the glorious nine (the number also, of the immortal Muses), was composed in the summer of 1812. The treatment of the bassoons in certain passages produces the effect of most hilarious laughter. The allegretto, to quote Berlioz, "This sort of thing falls entire from heaven into the composer's brain," and one could well believe it, if only the metronome tick-tick did not betray the earthly element of fun lurking behind the exquisite melody. The minuetto is full of grace and dignity and the finale with its upbuilding of simple themes, until they convey a world of sentiment and feeling, bears the imprint of a genius, that could touch nothing commonplace or trivial without ennobling it.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1900

NEW BOSTON MUSIC HALL FINANCES

Annual Report Shows About $200,000 to Have Been Handled Within the Past Year

The annual report of the financial condition of the New Boston Music Hall shows that about $200,000 has been handled by the corporation within the past year, as follows: Cash on hand, Jan. 1, 1899, $158; subscriptions to new stock, $198,200; miscellaneous, $2898; total, $201,257. Various expenditures, $6789; for construction, $103,788; cash on hand, $90,678; total, $201,257. The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at 320 Tremont Building at noon on Feb. 21. The main business will be to see whether the stockholders will ratify a lease, dated July 6, 1899, of real estate on Huntington avenue to Henry L. Higginson, and will authorize an agreement with him and other owners of adjacent land, arranging for projection of foundations on the estate of the latter.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening last, was as follows:

Chadwick: "Adonais," Elegiac Overture (MS., first time).

Robert Fuchs: Serenade for String Orchestra, No. 1, in D major, opus 9.

Wagner: Entr'acte, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of the Master Singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," act III.

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93.

Mr. Chadwick's new overture, written in memory of his friend Frank Fay Marshall, who died in 1897, shows the composer in a somewhat new light. It is the most modern in spirit of anything I know from his pen. Hitherto Mr. Chadwick has adhered pretty strictly to the classic forms—at least, as strictly as Brahms—and his works have been redolent of the spirit of those forms. His "Melpomene" overture, for instance, is nothing if not classic. That he has shown perfect freedom in the classic vein, that his inventiveness and expression have not been in the least trammelled by the forms he chose to work in, is only to his credit; it shows him to have been in perfect sympathy with the forms, that his adopting them was a case of natural selection, not a mere copying of classic models. And now, in this "Adonais," the form he chooses is an equally natural expression of the more modern spirit in which the work is conceived. He has outgrown the classic idea, his time for being modern has come, and he follows the new instinct with complete willingness and frankness.

In this matter of form, it is important to distinguish between the mere scheme of a form and its essential character, the spirit in which it is treated. As far as mere formal scheme and plan go, the form of the "Adonais" is virtually the same as that of his older overtures. There is still a first part, a middle part or free fantasia and a recapitulation followed by a free code. The fact that he omits repeating his first theme at the beginning of the recapitulation is not, in itself, new; if I remember aright there is the same omission in the "Melpomene" as there certainly is in Brahms's tragic overture. This omission is not unclassic per se. But, if the scheme is practically the same, the spirit and treatment are different; both are essentially modern and romantic. The very character of the thematic material in the "Adonais" is modern, in sharp contrast to the classic reserve shown in the "Melpomene;" the expression is more outspoken, more purely emotional and dramatic. When his second theme comes in—in an entirely new tempo, as it does in the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony—there is something more than the classic change of mood; there is what corresponds to an actual change of scene, so to speak (in the dramatic sense), the formal unity is broken, and much more effectively than it would have been had there been no second theme at all, or by any other mere irregularity. Remember, I say only that the formal unity is broken; for there is no lack of inner coherence, the second theme itself is based upon a figure that appeared earlier in the overture, and is no interloper; it is in no sense merely episodic. But here we have essentially modern and romantic musical development, not the old classic structure.

As for this extremely beautiful and soulful second theme, is it unfortunate or not that its initial phrase is, note for note, the same as that ever-recurring cry of "Ach! Isolde!" (not in the text, but in the orchestra) that pervades parts of the third act of "Tristan"? Is it unfortunate or not that the ear is prepared for recognizing this reminiscence by the augmented-6th harmonies in the slow introduction? There can be no charge of plagiarism here; for neither Wagner nor anyone else can claim a figure of but three notes as indefeasibly his own, and Wagner has no copyright on the augmented 6th. Both figure and chord (which, by the way, do not go together, but belong to different parts of the overture) have probably been used a thousand times by composers; there is no more plagiarism in using them again than there would be in an author's using the word "and" or the expression "sunlit heights." Still the coincidence leads one to feel that there is a certain Wagnerish flavor to some passages in the "Adonais"; one feels that all in it would not have been just so, had Wagner never existed.

To me the "Adonais" is exceedingly beautiful, noble, profoundly expressive. I am particularly delighted that, at the first hearing, I could not always find my bearings in it. It is only the weak work that is understood at a flash; the strong, profound and original work takes time to soak in. After but a single hearing, I understand thas "Adonais" no more completely than I did Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique," the prelude to "Tristan," or Beethoven's eighth symphony. But I have an inkling that it is splendid music, all the same.

Fuchs's serenade is dead as a door nail. The first movement, which might be called a fantasia on Mendelssohn's "Happy and blest are they," is not unpleasing; but the rest is irritatingly dull. The man has not even imbued himself with the spirit of the string orchestra, as, for instance, Grieg had on similar occasions; his treatment is so orchestral that you keep missing the wind; you would give a dollar now and then for a flute or a horn! Why rake up these old things by composers of merely local—I am tempted to add "and suburban"—reputation? Fuchs has lived most of his life, and doubtless paid taxes, in Vienna; let the Viennese have the trouble of listening to him; there is no reason why we should.

The "Meistersinger" selections came as a refreshing draught to the thirsty ear. Beethoven's eighth was great and wonderful as ever. Both were admirably read and played. Indeed, the orchestra did superbly almost throughout the concert; only in some passages of Mr. Chadwick's overture did I feel that the playing left something to be desired.

W. F. A.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1900

Cambridge Symphony Concert

Miss Suza Doane was soloist at the Cambridge Symphony Concert, last evening. While the Chopin F-minor pianoforte concerto does not demand very heroic playing, it calls for more energy than Miss Doane gave it. Not to speak of the first part of the first movement, when she was still suffering from her evident nervousness, Miss Doane made clear that she has a fluent technique, with even scales; that she uses the pedal with discretion, if not with great finesse; that she phrases intelligently and unaffectedly; and lastly, she showed that she is thoroughly musical. With all these things in her favor, however, she did not make a great impression. Although the larghetto was charmingly played, it was not in sufficient contrast to the first movement to be effective; and then the beautiful dance rhythms of the vivace, instead of going with a swing, were almost as subdued as the larghetto. While Miss Doane's tone was never hard, it scarcely once rose to a forte, and not once to a fortissimo. In fact, one could say of Miss Doane's playing what a musical person once said of Mme. Emma Nevada's singing: It is like looking at a beautiful stage picture through the wrong end of an opera-glass. Miss Deane, if she were in good form last evening, certainly has not strength enough to play with an orchestra. Such musical playing as hers, however, could not fail to be delightful in a small hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB 11, 1900.

FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme Ternina, to whom the climate of America has been most unkind, and prevented her appearance in this country last season as well as delaying her debut this year until recently, was a welcome soloist at last week's symphony concert, and the cordiality of her reception must have convinced the great artist that her enforced retirement had not caused remembrance of her former operatic work in this city to be forgotten. She gave a recitative and aria from "Fidelio" and the Brunnhilde music of the closing scene of "Gotterdammerung." The orchestral numbers were Haydn's G major symphony and the "Medea" orchestral suite by Vincent d'Indy, the latter for the first time here.

Despite the fact that Mme Ternina has but recently been able to resume her professional duties, she showed but few traces of trouble with her throat, and these were only in sustained passages in the lower register, and in some of the attacks in the upper notes. The rest of her performance is deserving of warm praise, her interpretations proving her right to be numbered among the foremost dramatic sopranos of the present day. Her voice is rich, powerful and sweet, and she colors her work with a skill and intelligence unknown to any except great artists. The impassioned nature of her selections needed the surroundings of the opera stage to be thoroughly effective, for there the action is so closely associated with the vocal work that the interest is sustained; but so far as her singing is concerned the intensity and dramatic force was splendidly presented, and in the tenderer episodes of the "Fidelio" aria the beauty of the sympathetic voice was notably in evidence. Brunnhilde's invocations to her steed were magnificent examples of vocal recitative, carried through with thrilling effect and not shouted, but sung. Her whole performance stamped her as one of the great interpreters of Wagner music, and at the close of the concert the audience expressed its appreciation of her work by innumerable recalls to the platform.

The Haydn symphony sounded a trifle old-fashioned when played with the compositions by newer writers, but the interpretation was admirable throughout, Mr Gericke giving a conscientious reading and the orchestral work being up to its usual high standard. The graceful movements of the second part and the brilliant closing movement, possibly, call for special mention by reason of the difficulties of the score, although those are not very formidable. The "Fidelio" and "Gotterdammerung" music was all that need be desired, although the latter calls for a larger orchestra and special instruments for producing Wagnerian effects.

The orchestral suite by Vincent d'Indy is a recent composition, and shows many traces in its orchestration of the Wagner influence. The four movements open with dissonate chords and measures which finally resolve themselves into harmonies quite skilfully worked out, but not specially original in instrumentation. The close of the second movement is very pretty, and the long-continued trillings in the strings at the opening of the third movement is rather striking, but the whole composition appears to be written so as to introduce musical oddities, and the Wagnerian suggestions have not the dramatic force shown by the master. Commendable work was done by the orchestra, the wind instruments deserving the most favorable mention, their share in the performance being specially prominent.

Miss Leonora Jackson will be the soloist this week, playing a Mendelssohn concerto for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be the "King Lear" overture, Berlioz; "Les Eolides," Cæsar Franck, and Brahms' second symphony.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 11, 1900.

(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening Conductor Gericke presented three novelties, the first, Haydn's "Oxford" symphony, which has not been heard in Boston for many years; the second, Mme. Ternina as a soloist for the first time at these concerts, and third, D'Indy's "Medee" suite orchestre, the latter for the first time in Boston. But with all these innovations the concert was not especially interesting.

At the next concert and rehearsal Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, who has been achieving succ[illegible] [illegible] the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 4, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr Gericke's players had the program all to themselves at the symphony concerts last week. They presented a delightful, well-contrasted program, that both gained and deserved favor. No wonder that other cities, however they may rival one another in jokes at the hub's expense, agree in envying her the possession of such a corps of skilled musicians as the Boston symphony orchestra.

The program opened with a real novelty, the elegiac overture "Adonais," by Mr George W. Chadwick, as yet unpublished. Those who were familiar with Mr Chadwick's previous work for orchestra counted, as a matter of course, upon success for this work, which is dedicated to the memory of the composer's friend, Frank Fay Marshall, who died July 26, 1897. It has only its title and purpose, the program announced, in common with Shelley's poem. The elegiac character of the tone poem is maintained skilfully and effectively from the sighing theme with which the overture begins until the close. Every page of the manuscript gives proof of musicianly skill and true artistic feeling. There are to be noted certain methods that once or twice suggest Grieg and his treatment of the minor in his Norse music. On the whole, however, the work is marked by a distinct originality, as well as unity of treatment, that rank among the chief charms of the work. "Adonais," in brief, is worthy of Mr Chadwick's high reputation as a composer for orchestra.

Exceptionally bright and breezy, with characteristics that made for good humor and content, was Fuchs' serenade for string orchestra, No. 1 in D major, which was second on director Gericke's program list. Robert Fuchs is not a composer given to propounding and evolving musical enigmas, as are some of our latter-day composers. He never poses as a spokesman for Zarathustra, nor attitudinizes as one who has a dark, occult message to interpret by weird crashes of strange instruments. He is content with old ways of score-making. He delights in evoking melody and harmony. Not for him is any attempt to embody "the thingness of the here." His happy mission is to make cheery and efficient use of an orchestra, as the auditors of the serenade for strings can bear willing testimony.

The selections from Wagner's "Meistersinger," including the prelude to the third act, the apprentices' dance, the processional chorus and the glorious greeting to Hans Sachs, gave to orchestra and leader alike their most exacting tasks—and how finely they were fulfilled! The music was from the original score (the vocal parts of course being omitted) and the performance from first to last was a veritable triumph in tone painting—something to live long in memory.

Beethoven's symphony No. 8 in F major—as young, melodious and pleasing as when it was first heard in the concert room—ended the program and it was followed with delight by the audiences. Even at the rehearsal 99 out of every 100 auditors "staid through," and seemed to thoroughly enjoy the performance, which was throughout admirable.

Mme Ternina, the famous lyric contralto, is to sing at this week's symphony concerts. D'Indy's orchestral suite, "Medea," is to have its first hearing. The program will also present Hadyn's "Oxford" symphony, and the closing scene from Wagner's "Twilight of the Gods."

Feb BOSTON POST, 8
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL FINANCES.

The report of the New Boston Music Hall for the year ending Jan. 1, 1900, shows:

Cash on hand, Jan. 1, 1899, $158; subscriptions to new stock, $198,200; miscellaenous, $2898; total, $201,257. Various expenditures, $6789; for construction, $103,788; cash on hand, $90,673; total, $201,257.

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at 320 Tremont building at noon, Feb. 21.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1900.

MUSIC HALL FINANCES.

Annual Report Made Public—Stockholders Will Vote This Month on Higginson Lease.

The report of the New Boston Music Hall for the year ending Jan. 1, 1900, shows:

Cash on hand, Jan 1 1899......		$158
Subscriptions to new stock....		198,200
Miscellaneous		2,898
Various expenditures.........	$6,789
For construction..............	103,788
Cash on hand.................	90,673
Total	$201,257	$201,257

The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at 320 Tremont Building at noon, Feb. 21. The main business will be to see whether the stockholders will ratify a lease, dated July 6, 1899, of real estate on Huntington Avenue to Henry L. Higginson, and will authorize an agreement with H. L. Higginson, et al., owners of adjoining land, arranging for projection of foundations on the estate of the latter.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. FEB. 4, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schubert left us only two movements of the unfinished symphony composed in 1822 and those were not published until after his death in 1828 There has been much speculation as to his reasons for not completing the other movement of which he left only nine bars. The explanation seems very clear after listening to the melancholy strains, whose sadness pervades even the allegro, and continues in the andante unbroken. One phrase in the allegro recalls the opening phrase of Haydn's "Spirit Song" and suggests to the imagination a soul's entrance into the grim halls of Fate, wherein however strenuous its struggles for love and happiness, both are forever denied. Under the empire of such oppressive thoughts there was no place for a gay and sportive measure. Schubert's life was heavy with unfulfilled aspirations, yet one of his biographers states:—"His power of creating was never cramped by the untoward events of his worldly position; in spite of bitter experiences he fulfilled his mission in the world gloriously, and found in the consciousness of his own value and the happiness of an inexhaustible source of invention, an abundant compensation for the absence or paucity of the good things of this life." Let us hope so, certainly, for the genius that can enrich the world with such heavenly music must have regions of content quite unknown to ordinary mortals. It was beautifully interpreted by the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's guiding hand, and was and always will be a delight to hear when so performed.

The concerto was given here in 1893 and played by the Russian violinist Brodsky as well as by Adamowski The former brought out the barbaric quality of the music which under Mr. Petschnikopp's hands took on a gentler character. This gentleman indeed while mastering every technical difficulty yet managed to make even the intricate cadenzas and violent bow-jumping, musical. His cantabile phrases were most alluringly delicate and smooth and his spirited rendering of the last movement quite electrifying as was proved by applause and the repeated calls he received. The Symphonic Dances were given for the first time and certainly led the instruments a dance if no more. The Norwegian rhythms never seem exactly ballabile, yet the whole effect is light and pleasing if not exactly gay.

The Elegiac Overture of Chadwick, heard for the first time, is, although not one of its composer's happiest efforts, nobly conceived and in its opening measures full of beauty. "Oh, weep for Adonais!" is the burden of its mournful strains and the instrumentation brings out the idea of lament, as well as rebellion at the cruel and untimely taking off of Adonais, the beautiful and beloved youth. It was carefully read and executed. The Serenade for strings by Fuchs is a most delightful work. The themes are melodious, well contrasted and developed. The allegro scherzando is full of gayety and the adagio a tranquilly flowing romance—while the finale with its dance rhythm in D minor changing to A major and finishing in D major closes the movement most inspiringly.

The entracte from the Meistersinger is so well known that comment is somewhat superfluous except as it regards the interpretation, which also needs only the remark that it was played in the usual unexcelled manner to which we are accustomed.

The symphony called by Beethoven a "Kleine Symphonie," and the last but one of the glorious nine (the number also, of the immortal Muses), was composed in the summer of 1812. The treatment of the bassoons in certain passages produces the effect of most hilarious laughter. The allegretto, to quote Berlioz, "This sort of thing falls entire from heaven into the composer's brain," and one could well believe it, if only the metronome tick-tick did not betray the earthly element of fun lurking behind the exquisite melody. The minuetto is full of grace and dignity and the finale with its upbuilding of simple themes, until they convey a world of sentiment and feeling, bears the imprint of a genius, that could touch nothing commonplace or trivial without ennobling it.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1900

NEW BOSTON MUSIC HALL FINANCES

Annual Report Shows About $200,000 to Have Been Handled Within the Past Year

The annual report of the financial condition of the New Boston Music Hall shows that about $200,000 has been handled by the corporation within the past year, as follows: Cash on hand, Jan. 1, 1899, $158; subscriptions to new stock, $198,200; miscellaneous, $2898; total, $201,257. Various expenditures, $6789; for construction, $103,788; cash on hand, $90,673; total, $201,257. The annual meeting of the stockholders will be held at 320 Tremont Building at noon on Feb. 21. The main business will be to see whether the stockholders will ratify a lease, dated July 6, 1899, of real estate on Huntington avenue to Henry L. Higginson, and will authorize an agreement with him and other owners of adjacent land, arranging for projection of foundations on the estate of the latter.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening last, was as follows:

Chadwick: "Adonais," Elegiac Overture (MS., first time).
Robert Fuchs: Serenade for String Orchestra, No. 1, in D major, opus 9.
Wagner: Entr'acte, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of the Master Singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg," act iii.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93.

Mr. Chadwick's new overture, written in memory of his friend Frank Fay Marshall, who died in 1897, shows the composer in a somewhat new light. It is the most modern in spirit of anything I know from his pen. Hitherto Mr. Chadwick has adhered pretty strictly to the classic forms—at least, as strictly as Brahms—and his works have been redolent of the spirit of those forms. His "Melpomene" overture, for instance, is nothing if not classic. That he has shown perfect freedom in the classic vein, that his inventiveness and expression have not been in the least trammelled by the forms he chose to work in, is only to his credit; it shows him to have been in perfect sympathy with the forms, that his adopting them was a case of natural selection, not a mere copying of classic models. And now, in this "Adonais," the form he chooses is an equally natural expression of the more modern spirit in which the work is conceived. He has outgrown the classic idea, his time for being modern has come, and he follows the new instinct with complete willingness and frankness.

In this matter of form, it is important to distinguish between the mere scheme of a form and its essential character, the spirit in which it is treated. As far as mere formal scheme and plan go, the form of the "Adonais" is virtually the same as that of his older overtures. There is still a first part, a middle part or free fantasia and a recapitulation followed by a free code. The fact that he omits repeating his first theme at the beginning of the recapitulation is not, in itself, new; if I remember aright there is the same omission in the "Melpomene" as there certainly is in Brahms's tragic overture. This omission is not unclassic per se. But, if the scheme is practically the same, the spirit and treatment are different; both are essentially modern and romantic. The very character of the thematic material in the "Adonais" is modern, in sharp contrast to the classic reserve shown in the "Melpomene;" the expression is more outspoken, more purely emotional and dramatic. When his second theme comes in—in an entirely new tempo, as it does in the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony—there is something more than the classic change of mood; there is what corresponds to an actual change of scene, so to speak (in the dramatic sense), the formal unity is broken, and much more effectively than it would have been had there been no second theme at all, or by any other mere irregularity. Remember, I say only that the formal unity is broken; for there is no lack of inner coherence, the second theme itself is based upon a figure that appeared earlier in the overture, and is no interloper; it is in no sense merely episodic. But here we have essentially modern and romantic musical development, not the old classic structure.

As for this extremely beautiful and soulful second theme, is it unfortunate or not that its initial phrase is, note for note, the same as that ever-recurring cry of "Ach! Isolde!" (not in the text, but in the orchestra) that pervades parts of the third act of "Tristan"? Is it unfortunate or not that the ear is prepared for recognizing this reminiscence by the augmented-6th harmonies in the slow introduction? There can be no charge of plagiarism here; for neither Wagner nor anyone else can claim a figure of but three notes as indefeasibly his own, and Wagner has no copyright on the augmented 6th. Both figure and chord (which, by the way, do not go together, but belong to different parts of the overture) have probably been used a thousand times by composers; there is no more plagiarism in using them again than there would be in an author's using the word "and" or the expression "sunlit heights." Still the coincidence leads one to feel that there is a certain Wagnerish flavor to some passages in the "Adonais"; one feels that all in it would not have been just so, had Wagner never existed.

To me the "Adonais" is exceedingly beautiful, noble, profoundly expressive. I am particularly delighted that, at the first hearing, I could not always find my bearings in it. It is only the weak work that is understood at a flash; the strong, profound and original work takes time to soak in. After but a single hearing, I understand thas "Adonais" no more completely than I did Tchaikovsky's "Pathétique," the prelude to "Tristan," or Beethoven's eighth symphony. But I have an inkling that it is splendid music, all the same.

Fuchs's serenade is dead as a door nail. The first movement, which might be called a fantasia on Mendelssohn's "Happy and blest are they," is not unpleasing; but the rest is irritatingly dull. The man has not even imbued himself with the spirit of the string orchestra, as, for instance, Grieg had on similar occasions; his treatment is so orchestral that you keep missing the wind; you would give a dollar now and then for a flute or a horn! Why rake up these old things by composers of merely local—I am tempted to add "and suburban"—reputation? Fuchs has lived most of his life, and doubtless paid taxes, in Vienna; let the Viennese have the trouble of listening to him; there is no reason why we should.

The "Meistersinger" selections came as a refreshing draught to the thirsty ear. Beethoven's eighth was great and wonderful as ever. Both were admirably read and played. Indeed, the orchestra did superbly almost throughout the concert; only in some passages of Mr. Chadwick's overture did I feel that the playing left something to be desired.

W. F. A.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1900.

Cambridge Symphony Concert

Miss Suza Doane was soloist at the Cambridge Symphony Concert, last evening. While the Chopin F-minor pianoforte concerto does not demand very heroic playing, it calls for more energy than Miss Doane gave it. Not to speak of the first part of the first movement, when she was still suffering from her evident nervousness, Miss Doane made clear that she has a fluent technique, with even scales; that she uses the pedal with discretion, if not with great finesse; that she phrases intelligently and unaffectedly; and lastly, she showed that she is thoroughly musical. With all these things in her favor, however, she did not make a great impression. Although the larghetto was charmingly played, it was not in sufficient contrast to the first movement to be effective; and then the beautiful dance rhythms of the vivace, instead of going with a swing, were almost as subdued as the larghetto. While Miss Doane's tone was never hard, it scarcely once rose to a forte, and not once to a fortissimo. In fact, one could say of Miss Doane's playing what a musical person once said of Mme. Emma Nevada's singing: It is like looking at a beautiful stage picture through the wrong end of an opera-glass. Miss Doane, if she were in good form last evening, certainly has not strength enough to play with an orchestra. Such musical playing as hers, however, could not fail to be delightful in a small hall.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB 11, 1900.

FIFTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme Ternina, to whom the climate of America has been most unkind, and prevented her appearance in this country last season as well as delaying her debut this year until recently, was a welcome soloist at last week's symphony concert, and the cordiality of her reception must have convinced the great artist that her enforced retirement had not caused remembrance of her former operatic work in this city to be forgotten. She gave a recitative and aria from "Fidelio" and the Brunnhilde music of the closing scene of "Gotterdammerung." The orchestral numbers were Haydn's G major symphony and the "Medea" orchestral suite by Vincent d'Indy, the latter for the first time here.

Despite the fact that Mme Ternina has but recently been able to resume her professional duties, she showed but few traces of trouble with her throat, and these were only in sustained passages in the lower register, and in some of the attacks in the upper notes. The rest of her performance is deserving of warm praise, her interpretations proving her right to be numbered among the foremost dramatic sopranos of the present day. Her voice is rich, powerful and sweet, and she colors her work with a skill and intelligence unknown to any except great artists. The impassioned nature of her selections needed the surroundings of the opera stage to be thoroughly effective, for there the action is so closely associated with the vocal work that the interest is sustained; but so far as her singing is concerned the intensity and dramatic force was splendidly presented, and in the tenderer episodes of the "Fidelio" aria the beauty of the sympathetic voice was notably in evidence. Brunnhilde's invocations to her steed were magnificent examples of vocal recitative, carried through with thrilling effect and not shouted, but sung. Her whole performance stamped her as one of the great interpreters of Wagner music, and at the close of the concert the audience expressed its appreciation of her work by innumerable recalls to the platform.

The Haydn symphony sounded a trifle old-fashioned when played with the compositions by newer writers, but the interpretation was admirable throughout, Mr Gericke giving a conscientious reading and the orchestral work being up to its usual high standard. The graceful movements of the second part and the brilliant closing movement, possibly, call for special mention by reason of the difficulties of the score, although those are not very formidable. The "Fidelio" and "Gotterdammerung" music was all that need be desired, although the latter calls for a larger orchestra and special instruments for producing Wagnerian effects.

The orchestral suite by Vincent d'Indy is a recent composition, and shows many traces in its orchestration of the Wagner influence. The four movements open with dissonate chords and measures which finally resolve themselves into harmonies quite skilfully worked out, but not specially original in instrumentation. The close of the second movement is very pretty, and the long-continued trillings in the strings at the opening of the third movement is rather striking, but the whole composition appears to be written so as to introduce musical oddities, and the Wagnerian suggestions have not the dramatic force shown by the master. Commendable work was done by the orchestra, the wind instruments deserving the most favorable mention, their share in the performance being specially prominent.

Miss Leonora Jackson will be the soloist this week, playing a Mendelssohn concerto for the violin. The orchestral numbers will be the "King Lear" overture, Berlioz; "Les Eolides," Cæsar Franck, and Brahms' second symphony.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, FEBRUARY 11, 1900.

(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening Conductor Gericke presented three novelties, the first, Haydn's "Oxford" symphony, which has not been heard in Boston for many years; the second, Mme. Ternina as a soloist for the first time at these concerts, and third, D'Indy's "Medee" suite orchestre, the latter for the first time in Boston. But with all these innovations the concert was not especially interesting.

At the next concert and rehearsal Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, who has been achieving such will be the soloist.

[69]

OBSCURED TEXT

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1900.

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

MILKA TERNINA.

(Copyright by Aimé Dupont, New York.)

This famous singer, the first of Wagnerian sopranos of today, was born in Croatia in 1863. She first studied in Agram, then at the Vienna Conservatory under Gänsbacher. She made her first appearance on the stage in June, 1883, as Elisabeth, at Leipzig. In that city she spent an unhappy year; she was four years at the Bremen Opera House; but in 1890 she was engaged by the Court Theatre, Munich, and she made her début there June 12, as Isolde. And there she has remained in spite of most flattering offers from Berlin and other cities. Her first appearance in this country was in Walter Damrosch's company at Boston, Feb. 4, 1896, as Brünnhilde in "Die Walküre." A year ago she revisited this country under the management of Mr. Ellis, but sickness prevented her singing, and this last season, as a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, she was severely handicapped by throat trouble, until Jan. 27, in New York, as Elisabeth, she was enthusiastically applauded and hailed as a singer of the very first rank. In this city she has appeared as Brünnhilde in "Die Walküre" and "Siegfried"; Elisabeth, Isolde, Valentine, Senta, Sielinde. She is a singer of beautiful voice and admirable performance; an actress of great distinction and exquisite subtlety; a woman of engaging manners, delightful simplicity, and marked intelligence.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. FEB. 11, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony in G [redacted] was chosen by Haydn for performance in England on the occasion of his receiving the degree of Musical Doctor from the University of Oxford has been known as the "Oxford" Symphony. He certainly selected a most genial and interesting work and the musical islanders give him a most cordial and appreciative welcome. "What will you do Papa Haydn" said Mozart to him before his departure for London. "You, who do not know the language"—"Oh, everyone understands my language," responded the k[redacted]maestro of the man. The symphony was played with just the right lightness and grace especially the gay presto of the finale. Fraulein Ternina gave the great [redacted] and air from Fidelio—[redacted]tterdamerung with fine [redacted] both scenes [redacted] being separated from their proper stage setting. Fraulein Ternina is a great artist on the stage but in the concert room, her fine gifts are not given their full scope.

The [redacted] on the program was the orchestral [redacted] Vincent d'Indy—"Media." The [redacted] measures anno[redacted] to follow but the tragedy is hardly grave enough for the terrible "Media" of cla[redacted] story—[redacted] did not end in "auroral triumph" as does the [redacted] Monsieur Mendes as illustrated by the music of M. d' Indy. The second movement contains an original and quaint dance and the third a plaintive and sighing melody representing the weary waiting of the forlorn wife. The next movement marked "moderately animated," represents Media and the returned wanderer and contains alternate passages of calm and passion. The final movement expressive of the "auroral triumph" closes a modern piece of writing which to fully understand must be heard more than a single time. The orchestra did not seem quite in sympathy with the work although it was executed with their usual correctness.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 42.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

D'Indy Suite Was the Novelty Furnished Music Lovers.

Its First Concert Performance in Boston—Charming Rendition of the Haydn "Oxford" Symphony—Fraulein Ternina Delights Audience with Her Fine Singing.

The programme for the 15th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, was:

"Oxford" symphony........................Haydn
Scena, "Abscheulichen," from "Fidelio" Beethoven
Orchestral suite, "Medea".....Vincent D'Indy
Closing scene of "Gotterdammerung"..Wagner

Fraulein Ternina was the soloist.

The D'Indy suite was the novelty of the occasion, this being its first concert performance in Boston. What to say of it on so brief an acquaintance is difficult to determine. As music composed to be played in the course of a tragedy it may possibly have high claims to consideration for the sympathy with which it has lent force to the poet's language and prevailing sentiment; but as music, pure and simple, it seems to be absolutely unmeaning, not to say uninteresting. It abounds in ear-tearing cacophonous harmonies, the like of which has not hitherto been heard in the scores of the most daring of modern musical innovators.

For writing of this kind one must acquire a taste, as one educates one's self into the joys of chewing tobacco or of other things at which the palate at first naturally revolts. Here and there is a faint glimpse of attempted melodiousness, but it is very brief and for the most part of a somewhat commonplace strain, which suggests, if it had been pursued further, that it would have landed the timid adventurer up to the chin in the tritely vulgar.

The orchestration is always ingenious and often effective as mere color, but the picture is altogether hues, without any discoverable design to account for them. The work, perhaps, is more interesting as an illustration of the influence of Wagner on a composer who had studied him from the outside in, instead of from the opposite direction. In any case, the music, judged by its effect in the concert room, is singularly monotonous, and is guilty of the crime of dry dulness. Such originality as it may have is too deliberately and laboriously displayed to produce any impression of fluency or of spontaneity. Its principal virtue is brevity. Mr. Gericke's reading of it, one may be sure, brought out all that there was in it to bring, and it was splendidly played.

A thoroughly charming and beautifully colored reading and performance of the fine Haydn Symphony were given.

Fraulein Ternina interpreted the exacting Beethoven scena and aria with vigorous intelligence, and, as far as strong declamatory effect and appreciation of the changing sentiment of the music are concerned, in a wholly artistic manner. Her tones were now and then throaty, and her voice seemed tired, but she sang with an authority, a largeness of style and an effectiveness that made her effort always interesting. She was stormed at with plaudits and heartily recalled.

In the Brunnhilde music of the "Gotterdammerung" she declaimed with thrilling fervor and immense dramatic emphasis of expression; and though the score makes almost cruel demands on the singer, Frl. Ternina met them readily, and invariably with broad purity of musical tone and a perfect legato. To those interested in vocal music that is for the most part imperatively confined to shouting, the Wagner singing of Frl. Ternina must have been a delight in its clearness, its musical quality and the evidence it gave that Wagner, even in his most violent moods, can be sung, instead of screamed, by an aritst who knows how to sing. But why give this "Gotterdammerung" scene in the concert room? It is full of meaning on the operatic stage, with the scenery, effects and action, but it means nothing intelligible elsewhere; and reading a minute description of the whole from a programme book does not aid the listener in catching the exact point at which the various details of the exceedingly busy action are emphasized by the orchestra.

If ever there was opera music that is incomprehensible without the surroundings for which it was written, it is this. So closely are the music and the stage movement wedded here that the one becomes utterly vague and bewildering without the other, and, as the music says nothing by itself and for itself, the result is chaotic.

Over the performance one may easily give loose to sturdy admiration. Mr. Gericke read the score with a fire and a glory of tone color and of effect, and the orchestra followed him with a brillfancy and a virtuosity that can be recorded with nothing short of enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is:

Overture, "King Lear"..................Berlioz
Concerto for violin.....................Mendelssohn
"Les Eolides"..........................Cesar Franck
(First time.)
Symphony, No. 2, in D-major..........Brahms

Miss Leonora Jackson is to be the soloist.

Frau Ternina has never touched me since that first time she appeared here as Elizabeth, and seemed the embodiment of royalty and the spring of which she sung. Three or four years have made a great change in her. She is still a sweet-faced woman, but at the Symphony rehearsal she did not look in the least a princess. Her afternoon costume was far from comme il faut or becoming, and, though quite likely last night in evening dress she was more modish, it is not her style to rival the elegance of Mme. Sembrich. But one charm Ternina has. She is not self-conscious, and in that trying five minutes when she hasn't a word to sing, having been consumed in the Wagnerian funeral pyre, what repose and self-obliteration were exhibited as, half facing Mr. Gericke, she followed the finale of the "Gotterdammerung" scene. Stage training, Wagner opera training, never showed to better advantage for a soloist.

[illegible] Club in [illegible] elected a non-resident member of the University Club in Philadelphia.

At the Symphony concert a week ago Saturday night, there was an unusually fine company of subscribers, and it is pleasant to find that no counter attraction can swerve them from their allegiance. A few of those whom we noted there were Maj. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Lothrop Thorndike, Mrs. Agassiz, Dr. and Mrs. John W. Elliot, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mr. Parkman Blake, Mme. Szumowska-Adamowski, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Miss Fanny Young, Mr. Charles L. Young, Mrs. William L. Horton, Mrs. James Tracey, Mrs. John Carter and Miss Carter, Mr. and Mrs. Norman McLeod, Mr. F. W. B. Byrne, Prof. and Mrs. Leo Lewis, Miss Anna Miller Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Faelton, Mr. and Mrs. Hay, Miss Hersey, Mr. Arthur Curran and Dr. Arthur Hartmann.

Friday afternoon, when Mme. Ternina was the soloist, there was a crush. The prima donna was called out five times after her first selection. She looked distinguished in gun metal broadcloth, appliqued with scroll designs of lighter shade. The short coat, with white satin revers, opened over a white lace bodice, which was caught with diamond pins. The hat was of black and pink velvet, with soft white feathers. This week Leonora Jackson, the already famous young violinist, will play, and, consequently, another crush will be in order.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 12, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—D'Indy's "Medea" Performed.

From the simplest to the most complex music, from the most suave to the most passionate, from the lightest to the heaviest scoring, with a great crescendo of constantly increasing modernization, went the programme of Saturday's symphony concert. It began with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. That melody can never quite lose its charm was shown by the popular applause lavished upon the diaphanous work. Even in its slow movement the flood gates of passion were kept carefully bolted, and its minuet was twin sister to each and every minuet of the formal composer.

How Haydn must have tired of the minuet, that Frankenstein monster to which he gave symphonic life! He wrote more than 100 symphonies and about 140 pieces of chamber music, and in almost every one of these 250 cycle-forms he introduced a minuet! Small wonder that Beethoven was sick of the minuet from the first and in his earliest symphony began to tug at the chain in which his teacher had bound the symphonic muse.

The finale, too, exhibits the precise and formal Haydn; the old Suite had ended with a jovial Gigue; the ancient law of cycle-forms seemed to be that after an auditor had listened to several instrumental movements he was to be rewarded with something merry as a climax. Neither Haydn nor Mozart rose above this idea; it was Beethoven who first evolved the thought that the great epic of instrumental music, the symphony, might end with loftiness rather than with jollity. There are a few exceptions to be found in Mozart's list of 49 symphonies, but they only prove the rollicking rule. Yet it was not unpleasant to listen to a work that was intelligible throughout, and we were glad to lay in our stores of melody against the storm of dissonances that was lowering.

And now there came Fraeulein Ternina, from far New York, with something like her old-time vigor and dramatic effect. Her voice is not yet just what it was before our climate conquered her larynx; but it sounded infinitely better at this concert than at any performance during the recent opera season. She sang Beethoven's "Abscheulicher" with fine effect, and received many recalls and bouquets at its close. The horn-player deserves an especial word of praise for his work in this number.

We do not understand M. Vincent D'Indy's works. We were mystified by his reversed variation form, called "Istar," which was played here a year or so ago; we were still more dazed by "Medea," an orchestral suite, played at this concert. It began with a series of studies in discord that were eminently successful—as such; dissonances that would set even false teeth on edge. Unless we greatly mistake, these musical cataclysms portend trouble for Jason and picture Medea's coming vengeance, but, apart from the scenic adjuncts, they might as well have portrayed a Chinese New Year or a New York Fourth of July. It all seemed to be modern hysteria, Wagner it is, but without any symptoms of Wagner's genius.

We hold it an art axiom that dissonances are the shadows of music, that our art must have its Chiaro-oscuro as well as painting; but when in a picture the shadows are greater than the lights, when in a drama the evil utterly overwhelms the good, or when in a composition the dissonances entirely obliterate the consonances, the result is neither pleasant nor good art. Our muse need not always smile, but she need not try to be a gorgon either.

But, amidst all the musical rickets, amidst syncopations that would have caused surprise to the great syncopationist, Schumann, there were many touches of striking orchestration, and even melodic phrases of considerable beauty, although these latter were always assassinated before they arrived at maturity. There were some ingenious organ-points in the shape of surprisingly long trills. The last two movements wer shapelier and more intelligible than the first three, although the dance of the second movement had some points of attractiveness.

After this picture of modern art at its worst, there came the very best of the latter-day school, the finale to "Goetterdaemmerung," the great climax of the greatest operatic work of our time. We prefer to hear this upon the concert stage, imagining its action, to viewing the average operatic representation—a stolid chorus marching with wooden logs, a burlesque funeral pyre, a cab-horse Grane, etc., etc. The chief fault in the former case being that the orchestra, being close to the singer, is apt to drown out her voice, which occurred once or twice with Ternina. But the deep dramatic meaning which the great artist gave to the phrases of the wronged Brunnhilde made this northern picture of sutteeism a most powerful climax to the concert.

Beyond the excess of power occasionally displayed, there was no possible fault to be found with the orchestral support; the leit-motiven were brought out with a clearness and beauty that calls for praise, and we find a more glorious and continuous tale told by this Greek-chorus of an orchestra in this scene than in the much vaunted "Siegfried's Funeral March." The work evidently appealed with great power to those who understood the Wagnerian tongue, and the larger part of the audience did not depart at the final cadence, but remained to call and recall Ternina to receive their thanks. It was a post-festum enthusiasm that is seldom seen at the symphony concerts.

Louis C. Elson.

OBSCURED TEXT

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 9, 1900.

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

MILKA TERNINA.

(Copyright by Aimé Dupont, New York.)

This famous singer, the first of Wagnerian sopranos of today, was born in Croatia in 1863. She first studied in Agram, then at the Vienna Conservatory under Gänsbacher. She made her first appearance on the stage in June, 1883, as Elisabeth, at Leipzig. In that city she spent an unhappy year; she was four years at the Bremen Opera House; but in 1890 she was engaged by the Court Theatre, Munich, and she made her début there June 12, as Isolde. And there she has remained in spite of most flattering offers from Berlin and other cities. Her first appearance in this country was in Walter Damrosch's company at Boston, Feb. 4, 1896, as Brünnhilde in "Die Walküre." A year ago she revisited this country under the management of Mr. Ellis, but sickness prevented her singing, and this last season, as a member of the Metropolitan Opera House Company, she was severely handicapped by throat trouble, until Jan. 27, in New York, as Elisabeth, she was enthusiastically applauded and hailed as a singer of the very first rank. In this city she has appeared as Brünnhilde in "Die Walküre" and "Siegfried"; Elisabeth, Isolde, Valentine, Senta, Sielinde. She is a singer of beautiful voice and admirable performance; an nctress of great distinction and exquisite subtlety; a woman of engaging manners, delightful simplicity, and marked intelligence.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. FEB. 11, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony in G major was chosen by Haydn for performance in England on the occasion of his receiving the degree of Musical Doctor from the University of Oxford has been known as the "Oxford" Symphony. He certainly selected a most genial and interesting work and the musical islanders give him a most cordial and appreciative welcome. "What will you do Papa Haydn" said Mozart to him before his departure for London. "You, who do not know the language"—"Oh, everyone understands my language," responded the kindly maestro of the man. The symphony was played with just the right lightness and grace especially the gay presto of the finale. Fraulein Ternina gave the great scene and air from Fidelio—also the closing [illegible] Gotterdameruing with fine expressiveness, although both scenes suffer from being separated from their proper stage setting. Fraulein Ternina is a great artist on the stage but in the concert room, her fine gifts are not given their full scope.

The novelty on the program was the orchestral suite by Vincent d'Indy—"Media." The first movement with its [illegible] measures announces something tragic to follow, but the tragedy is hardly grave enough for the terrible "Media" of classic story—which did not end in "auroral triumph" as does the tragedy of Monsieur Mendes as illustrated by the music of M. d' Indy. The second movement contains an original and quaint dance and the third a plaintive and sighing melody representing the weary waiting of the forlorn wife. The next movement marked "moderately animated," represents Media and the returned wanderer and contains alternate passages of calm and passion. The final movement expressive of the "auroral triumph" closes a modern piece of writing which to fully understand must be heard more than a single time The orchestra did not seem quite in sympathy with the work although it was executed with their usual correctness.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 42.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

D'Indy Suite Was the Novelty Furnished Music Lovers.

Its First Concert Performance in Boston—Charming Rendition of the Haydn "Oxford" Symphony—Fraulein Ternina Delights Audience with Her Fine Singing.

The programme for the 15th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, was:

"Oxford" symphony..................Haydn
Scena, "Abscheulicher," from "Fidelio"
Beethoven
Orchestral suite, "Medea".....Vincent D'Indy
Closing scene of "Gotterdammerung"..Wagner

Fraulein Ternina was the soloist.

The D'Indy suite was the novelty of the occasion, this being its first concert performance in Boston. What to say of it on so brief an acquaintance is difficult to determine. As music composed to be played in the course of a tragedy it may possibly have high claims to consideration for the sympathy with which it has lent force to the poet's language and prevailing sentiment; but as music, pure and simple, it seems to be absolutely unmeaning, not to say uninteresting. It abounds in ear-tearing cacophonous harmonies, the like of which has not hitherto been heard in the scores of the most daring of modern musical innovators.

For writing of this kind one must acquire a taste, as one educates one's self into the joys of chewing tobacco or of other things at which the palate at first naturally revolts. Here and there is a faint glimpse of attempted melodiousness, but it is very brief and for the most part of a somewhat commonplace strain, which suggests, if it had been pursued further, that it would have landed the timid adventurer up to the chin in the tritely vulgar.

The orchestration is always ingenious and often effective as mere color, but the picture is altogether hues, without any discoverable design to account for them. The work, perhaps, is more interesting as an illustration of the influence of Wagner on a composer who had studied him from the outside in, instead of from the opposite direction. In any case, the music, judged by its effect in the concert room, is singularly monotonous, and is guilty of the crime of dry dulness. Such originality as it may have is too deliberately and laboriously displayed to produce any impression of fluency or of spontaneity. Its principal virtue is brevity. Mr. Gericke's reading of it, one may be sure, brought out all that there was in it to bring, and it was splendidly played.

A thoroughly charming and beautifully colored reading and performance of the fine Haydn Symphony were given.

Fraulein Ternina interpreted the exacting Beethoven scena and aria with vigorous intelligence, and, as far as strong declamatory effect and appreciation of the changing sentiment of the music are concerned, in a wholly artistic manner. Her tones were now and then throaty, and her voice seemed tired, but she sang with an authority, a largeness of style and an effectiveness that made her effort always interesting. She was stormed at with plaudits and heartily recalled.

In the Brunnhilde music of the "Gotterdammerung" she declaimed with thrilling fervor and immense dramatic emphasis of expression; and though the score makes almost cruel demands on the singer, Frl. Ternina met them readily, and invariably with broad purity of musical tone and a perfect legato. To those interested in vocal music that is for the most part imperatively confined to shouting, the Wagner singing of Frl. Ternina must have been a delight in its clearness, its musical quality and the evidence it gave that Wagner, even in his most violent moods, can be sung, instead of screamed, by an aritst who knows how to sing. But why give this "Gotterdammerung" scene in the concert room? It is full of meaning on the operatic stage, with the scenery, effects and action, but it means nothing intelligible elsewhere; and reading a minute description of the whole from a programme book does not aid the listener in catching the exact point at which the various details of the exceedingly busy action are emphasized by the orchestra.

If ever there was opera music that is incomprehensible without the surroundings for which it was written, it is this. So closely are the music and the stage movement wedded here that the one becomes utterly vague and bewildering without the other, and, as the music says nothing by itself and for itself, the result is chaotic.

Over the performance one may easily give loose to sturdy admiration. Mr. Gericke read the score with a fire and a glory of tone color and of effect, and the orchestra followed him with a brillfancy and a virtuosity that can be recorded with nothing short of enthusiasm.

The programme for the next concert is:

Overture, "King Lear"..................Berlioz
Concerto for violin..................Mendelssohn
"Les Eolides"....................Cesar Franck
(First time.)
Symphony, No. 2, in D-major..........Brahms

Miss Leonora Jackson is to be the soloist.

Frau Ternina has never touched me since that first time she appeared here as Elizabeth, and seemed the embodiment of royalty and the spring of which she sung. Three or four years have made a great change in her. She is still a sweet-faced woman, but at the Symphony rehearsal she did not look in the least a princess. Her afternoon costume was far from comme il faut or becoming, and, though quite likely last night in evening dress she was more modish, it is not her style to rival the elegance of Mme. Sembrich. But one charm Ternina has. She is not self-conscious, and in that trying five minutes when she hasn't a word to sing, having been consumed in the Wagnerian funeral pyre, what repose and self-obliteration were exhibited as, half facing Mr. Gericke, she followed the finale of the "Gotterdammerung" scene. Stage training, Wagner opera training, never showed to better advantage for a soloist.

Mr. Frederick R. Comee, Harvard '75, a member of the University Club in Boston, has just been elected a non-resident member of the University Club in Philadelphia.

At the Symphony concert a week ago Saturday night, there was an unusually fine company of subscribers, and it is pleasant to find that no counter attraction can swerve them from their allegiance. A few of those whom we noted there were Maj. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Lothrop Thorndike, Mrs. Agassiz, Dr. and Mrs. John W. Elliot, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mr. Parkman Blake, Mme. Szumowska-Adamowski, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. and Mrs. Oliver Crocker Stevens, Miss Fanny Young, Mr. Charles L. Young, Mrs. William L. Horton, Mrs. James Tracey, Mrs. John Carter and Miss Carter, Mr. and Mrs. Norman McLeod, Mr. F. W. B. Byrne, Prof. and Mrs. Leo Lewis, Miss Anna Miller Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Faelton, Mr. and Mrs. Hay, Miss Hersey, Mr. Arthur Curran and Dr. Arthur Hartmann.

Friday afternoon, when Mme. Ternina was the soloist, there was a crush. The prima donna was called out five times after her first selection. She looked distinguished in gun metal broadcloth, appliqued with scroll designs of lighter shade. The short coat, with white satin revers, opened over a white lace bodice, which was caught with diamond pins. The hat was of black and pink velvet, with soft white feathers. This week Leonora Jackson, the already famous young violinist, will play, and, consequently, another crush will be in order.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 12, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—D'Indy's "Medea" Performed.

From the simplest to the most complex music, from the most suave to the most passionate, from the lightest to the heaviest scoring, with a great crescendo of constantly increasing modernization, went the programme of Saturday's symphony concert. It began with Haydn's "Oxford" symphony. That melody can never quite lose its charm was shown by the popular applause lavished upon the diaphanous work. Even in its slow movement the flood gates of passion were kept carefully bolted, and its minuet was twin sister to each and every minuet of the formal composer.

How Haydn must have tired of the minuet, that Frankenstein monster to which he gave symphonic life! He wrote more than 100 symphonies and about 140 pieces of chamber music, and in almost every one of these 250 cycle-forms he introduced a minuet! Small wonder that Beethoven was sick of the minuet from the first and in his earliest symphony began to tug at the chain in which his teacher had bound the symphonic muse.

The finale, too, exhibits the precise and formal Haydn; the old Suite had ended with a jovial Gigue; the ancient law of cycle-forms seemed to be that after an auditor had listened to several instrumental movements he was to be rewarded with something merry as a climax. Neither Haydn nor Mozart rose above this idea; it was Beethoven who first evolved the thought that the great epic of instrumental music, the symphony, might end with loftiness rather than with jollity. There are a few exceptions to be found in Mozart's list of 49 symphonies, but they only prove the rollicking rule. Yet it was not unpleasant to listen to a work that was intelligible throughout, and we were glad to lay in our stores of melody against the storm of dissonances that was lowering.

And now there came Fraeulein Ternina, from far New York, with something like her old-time vigor and dramatic effect. Her voice is not yet just what it was before our climate conquered her larynx; but it sounded infinitely better at this concert than at any performance during the recent opera season. She sang Beethoven's "Abscheulicher" with fine effect, and received many recalls and bouquets at its close. The horn-player deserves an especial word of praise for his work in this number.

We do not understand M. Vincent D'Indy's works. We were mystified by his reversed variation form, called "Istar," which was played here a year or so ago; we were still more dazed by "Medea," an orchestral suite, played at this concert. It began with a series of studies in discord that were eminently successful—as such; dissonances that would set even false teeth on edge. Unless we greatly mistake, these musical cataclysms portend trouble for Jason and picture Medea's coming vengeance, but, apart from the scenic adjuncts, they might as well have portrayed a Chinese New Year or a New York Fourth of July. It all seemed to be modern hysteria, Wagner it is, but without any symptoms of Wagner's genius.

We hold it an art axiom that dissonances are the shadows of music, that our art must have its Chiaro-oscuro as well as painting; but when in a picture the shadows are greater than the lights, when in a drama the evil utterly overwhelms the good, or when in a composition the dissonances entirely obliterate the consonances, the result is neither pleasant nor good art. Our muse need not always smile, but she need not try to be a gorgon either.

But, amidst all the musical rickets, amidst syncopations that would have caused surprise to the great syncopationist, Schumann, there were many touches of striking orchestration, and even melodic phrases of considerable beauty, although these latter were always assassinated before they arrived at maturity. There were some ingenious organ-points in the shape of surprisingly long trills. The last two movements wer shapelier and more intelligible than the first three, although the dance of the second movement had some points of attractiveness.

After this picture of modern art at its worst, there came the very best of the latter-day school, the finale to "Goetterdaemmerung," the great climax of the greatest operatic work of our time. We prefer to hear this upon the concert stage, imagining its action, to viewing the average operatic representation—a stolid chorus marching with wooden logs, a burlesque funeral pyre, a cab-horse Grane, etc., etc. The chief fault in the former case being that the orchestra, being close to the singer, is apt to drown out her voice, which occurred once or twice with Ternina. But the deep dramatic meaning which the great artist gave to the phrases of the wronged Brunnhilde made this northern picture of sutteeism a most powerful climax to the concert.

Beyond the excess of power occasionally displayed, there was no possible fault to be found with the orchestral support; the leit-motiven were brought out with a clearness and beauty that calls for praise, and we find a more glorious and continuous tale told by this Greek-chorus of an orchestra in this scene than in the much vaunted "Siegfried's Funeral March." The work evidently appealed with great power to those who understood the Wagnerian tongue, and the larger part of the audience did not depart at the final cadence, but remained to call and recall Ternina to receive their thanks. It was a post-festum enthusiasm that is seldom seen at the symphony concerts.

Louis C. Elson.

[illegible] 1900.

D'INDY.

First Performance of "Medea Suite."

A Composer Too Little Known Here.

Ternina Sings in Formal Concert.

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Oxford,"......Haydn
Scena, "Abscheulicher!" and aria, "Komm,' Hoffnung," from "Fidelio," .... Beethoven
"Medea," Orchestral Suite after Catulle Mendes's Tragedy, Op. 47..............d'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
I. Prelude. II. Pantomime: Dance. III. Medea Waiting. IV. Medea and Jason. V. The Auroral Triumph.
Closing scene of "Goetterdammerung," .... Wagner

Paul Marie Thédore Vincent d'Indy wrote incidental music to Catulle Mendès's tragedy, "Médée," which was first produced at the Renaissance, Paris, Oct. 28, 1898. Sarah Bernhardt was the heroine and Darmont the perfidious Jason. The suite formed from this music was played at a Colonne concert in Paris March 5, 1899.

In Mendès's tragedy Medea has been forsaken by Jason. She plots vengeance and gains permission from Creon, who has banished her, to remain until she may seek advice from Hecate. Jason swears to her—for she meets him and reminds him of their former and mad love—that he marries Creusa only for political reasons; that he will leave her his wedding night to seek Medea's arms. Medea waits, and waits in vain. The moon is turned to blood. The wedding feast is over; the lights in the palace are extinguished; the doors of the palace are closed. Then, furious, Medea contrives the awful presents that will destroy Creon, her rival, Jason, and the children. Then, then she will rise triumphant, the sorceress, in her mountain-car and ascend to the Sun, her father.

It is a pity that some clue to this music was not given in the program book; for this music was originally scenic and it is only fair toward the composer that the hearer in concert should have some idea of the composer's intention.

It is also a pity that the more important works of d'Indy have not been played here. We know him only by his beautiful symphonic poem "Istar" and some chamber music. We have not heard his "Wallenstein," which was performed in New York under Seidl in 1888; "Sauge fleuri;" "La Forêt enchantée;" the symphony on a Mountain Air; the suite in D for trumpet, two flutes; or the Fantaisie on French folk songs for oboe and orchestra which was played with Mr. Longy as soloist in Paris Dec. 12, 1897. But it is a fashion in Boston to introduce serious composers through their works of minor importance: Witness Bourgault-Ducoudray with his little "Burial of Ophelia" and Glazounoff with his juvenile "Lyric Peom."

The "Medea" suite disappointed on the whole—and yet it seems unfair to judge the music taken from its proper frame and played none too well; for there was a feeling of insecurity in the ensemble and a lack of finenesse in the detail. The first prelude suggests at the beginning a scholarly and ingenious burlesque on a well-known—too well-known progression in "Tristan"—a pompous, swollen burlesque of inversion. The dance is of forced piquancy, yet not without an appeal to immediate popularity. The first section of "Medea Waiting" is of true beauty and decided mood. But in "Medea and Jason" I found no real passion, either flaming in modern fashion, or repressed as in the music of Gluck, the great master of musical classical tragedy. How this whole suite of d'Indy shrinks and is as nothing in comparison with the overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," which is saturated with the spirit of Greek tragedy! You may answer, "But d'Indy was writing his music to a Greek tragedy as Mendès understood it." Yes, but on the other hand, Medea as played by Bernhardt was still a classic figure, and even if the story was subtly modernized, is it too much to ask for one theme of intense passion or one movement that recalls the frozen frenzy of a frieze? Then the final movement, "The Auroral Triumph"—where a solemn hymn is trampled under the feet of the racing Valkyries! This suite as concert music is weak in thematic invention, forced and labored in harmonic treatment. Orchestration, no matter how ingenious, will not redeem a serious work that is fundamentally without depth or passion.

* * *

The "Oxford" Symphony was written in 1788, the year of the "Children's" Symphony, and it was written for Paris. When Haydn went to Oxford in 1791 to be made a Mus. Doc. he took another symphony with him for the occasion; but there was not time enough to rehearse it, so he fell back on one already known, the one now called the Oxford. The Morning Chronicle a few days after the performance said: "A more wonderful composition never was heard. The merit of the work in the opinion of all the musicians present exceeded all praise." Wonderful no doubt it was in 1791, and the finale may still be heard with pleasure. I wish that Mr. Gericke would some day try the experiment of playing a Haydn Symphony with the number of strings usual in Haydn's [illegible] advanced period.

Ternina was warmly greeted and loudly applauded. Seldom does a great dramatic singer appear to full advantage in concert, and Ternina is not an exception in this respect. She displayed often beauty in tone and vocal skill, breadth of phrasing, and intelligence in the broadest sense; and yet there was the constant thought, "Would this were in the opera itself!" The aria from "Fidelio" suffers when it is paraded in the heartless concert hall, and what singer can stand up against the orchestral fury of Wagner when it rages above the stage and not below it? Ternina is a woman that is not given to screaming; she is one of the very few singers in German opera that know the difference between singing and screaming and know how to sing. But last night there were times when she was obliged either to scream or to stand there, inaudible.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, "Oxford."
Beethoven: Scena, "Abscheulicher!" and Aria, "Komm', Hoffnung," from "Fidelio."
D'Indy: "Médée," Suite d'Orchestre, d'après la Tragédie de Catulle Mendès, opus 47. (First time in Boston.)
Wagner: Closing Scene from "Götterdämmerung."
Miss Milka Ternina was the singer.

Although the "Oxford" sympathy was not written for the occasion, one can see why Haydn chose it for performance at Oxford when he was given the degree of Mus. Doc. by the university. He was lucky to have such a work in his trunk—not having time to write a new one; for it is one of the most elaborately developed of his symphonies, one of the most "learned," as the phrase goes, and well fitted to celebrate academic honors. On the other hand, it is one of the freest, the least academic in form; and, in this respect, may be taken as a sort of manifesto of artistic independence on Haydn's part—as much as to say: "The great university may honor my musical learning and skill, but it shall not presume to tell my genius what it shall do, or not do!"

Was it mere imagination, or was there some real reason for my finding Haydn less his best self in the elaborate contrapuntal developments of this work than in many of his simpler symphonies? That he was skilled musician enough to find himself perfectly at home and at ease in the style, may go without saying; but to be at home is one thing, to be in one's best and most characteristic vein, another. Certainly I seemed to find here the Haydn of "Achieved is the glorious work," strong, if you will, but inviting comparisons with Handel, not wholly to his own advantage, rather than the Haydn of "A new-created world," supreme in his own way, imitable by no one. For another thing, I cannot remember hearing anything else by Haydn in which there was so much of Mozart.

The performance was one of the most stinging slaps in the face of our present fashion of giving the older orchestral classics in big halls, with over-large orchestras. I have little sympathy with the idea of reducing the number of strings to the old Haydn standard; Haydn's small orchestra would be lost in the Music Hall. Yet, with our large orchestra, it was noticeable that, in the strong tutti-passages, the brass held its own to perfection against the strings, but, in softer passages, the strings were all out of balance with the wood-wind. Now, in a hall of the proper size for this class of music, a small body of strings can be in quite as good balance with the brass in fortissimo as our large mass of strings is in the Music Hall; but the balance between strings and the softer wood-wind will be equally good, which it can never be, in any hall, when the strings so largely outnumber the wind instruments.

Vincent d'Indy's "Médée" suite is a poser! I happened to hear the whole of it at a working rehearsal—not the most coherent way of hearing new music—and it sounded like the dreariest bosh, without an idea in it. At the concert it sounded better; atrociously ugly, if you will, but one could catch a glimpse of latent strength in it. My first impulse of abhorrence was somehow toned down by the thought that, very probably, the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan" sounded much like that to, say, Ignaz Moscheles, when he first heard it. The very fact that this suite is about the worst-sounding music I ever heard gives me pause; that is the way great and original works do sound, at first. To be sure, this is no sign of greatness, for execrably bad and mean works sound no better; but it is one of the wellnigh inevitable concomitants of greatness and originality. Distrust the new work that begins by caressing the ear; also distrust your first impression of the one that begins by being rude to it. I am willing to wait; the time may come when I shall be on my knees before this suite. Only of one thing am I tolerably certain now: the "apothesis" of the whole, the last part of the "Triomphe Auroral," is poor and weak.

Miss Ternina was most warmly received. I cannot help regretting that she, or anyone, should sing Beethoven's "Abscheulicher" on the concert-stage today. It loses by being taken out from its proper frame. Then, it is no novelty, and one can afford to wait until some opera company sees fit to give "Fidelio" here. The soprano concert repertory with orchestra is tolerably large, and there is much in it with which we are not familiar. With the Wagner things it is different; the great scenes in his music-dramas which absolutely need the singer's coöperation, and cannot be given merely orchestrally, have not been heard here so often that a chance to hear them again, even on the concert platform, is not a boon. Besides, it is—to me, at least—infinitely interesting to hear a thing like the last scene in "Götterdämmerung" so given that you can give the music your undivided attention, undistracted by inadequate stage setting and clumsy management. When we have seen this scene thoroughly well given on the stage, with all Wagner's directions adequately carried out, it may be time to think of banishing it from the concert-room; but, until then, I must say that I prefer it as a concert piece. Yes, in all but one respect. The orchestral part, when played as it was on Saturday evening, with a full Wagnerian orchestra, absolutely needs the "mystic gulf," the sunken orchestra; such tremendous scoring cannot be given straight out into the hall without prejudice to the singer. Wagner calculated all this very exactly; the sunken orchestra is a necessary part of his scheme. Even in an opera house the uncovered orchestra is bad; and on the concert stage, where all the wood-wind, all the trumpets and trombones, play straight out into the hall—and not sideways, as they do in opera—it is still worse. The correct dynamic balance of the parts is gone. Moreover, nearly everything has to be played timidly, without frank expressiveness, or else the singer is drowned out. It is all wrong and askew. As in a violin concerto, you breathe freely when the tuttis come!

On Saturday evening Mr. Gericke and the orchestra—which was complete, save for the single harp, instead of six—did their best to give Miss Ternina a fair chance; at times successfully, but at others she was inaudible. One could comfort one's self for this by appreciating that she held fast by legitimate singing, and refused to scream; it is better not to be heard than to yell, and Miss Ternina maintained the dignity of her artisthood throughout. Her voice was not at its best, somewhat clouded by that New England air to which she seems unable to inure herself. But, in technical excellence of singing, beauty of phrasing and expression, in that warmth of genius which is indestructibly hers, she was magnificent indeed. Refinement is a much-abused word; but here is an artist who combines force and passion with the highest sort of refinement. She was rapturously applauded and repeatedly recalled.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture to "Le Roi Léar," opus 4; Mendelssohn, concerto for violin, in E-minor, opus 64; César Franck, "Les Eolides" (first time in Boston); Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D-major, opus 73. Miss Leonora Jackson will be the violinist.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1900.

ONE of the effective concerts of the season was given last night by the Boston Symphony, in which Gericke ranged with wonderful effect from the classicality of Haydn into the fervid and fervent modernity of Wagner and D'Indy. Ternina was the soloist.

The program:

Symphony in G major..Haydn
Scena, Abschenlicher! and aria, Komm', Hoffnung, from Fidelio, op. 72...Beethoven
Médée, suite orchestre, d'après la tragédie de Catulle Mendès, op. 47..D'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
Closing scene from Götterdämmerung..........................Wagner

The Suite of D'Indy is a remarkable composite of the French and German styles; there is much cacophony, but cacophony like caviare is an acquired taste, and the work is undeniably masterful.

The Wagner Finale was stupendous, and was given with all the wealth of color, tone and resources of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leonora Jackson will be the next soloist.

* * *

N JOURNAL—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13,

BOSTON'S FINANCIERS. (I.)

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

Of Lee, Higginson & Co.

(From "New York Stock Exchange Views," copyrighted, 1897, by Moses King, N. Y.)

BOSTON SUNDAY JOURNAL
FEBRUARY 11, 1900.

D'INDY.

First Performance of "Medea Suite."

A Composer Too Little Known Here.

Ternina Sings in Formal Concert.

The program of the fifteenth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Oxford,"......Haydn
Scena, "Abscheulicher!" and aria, "Komm,' Hoffnung," from "Fidelio," .... Beethoven
"Medea," Orchestral Suite after Catulle Mendes's Tragedy, Op. 47..............d'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
I. Prelude. II. Pantomime: Dance. III. Medea Waiting. IV. Medea and Jason. V. The Auroral Triumph.
Closing scene of "Goetterdammerung," .... Wagner

Paul Marie Thédore Vincent d'Indy wrote incidental music to Catulle Mendès's tragedy, "Médée," which was first produced at the Renaissance, Paris, Oct. 28, 1898. Sarah Bernhardt was the heroine and Darmont the perfidious Jason. The suite formed from this music was played at a Colonne concert in Paris March 5, 1899.

In Mendès's tragedy Medea has been forsaken by Jason. She plots vengeance and gains permission from Creon, who has banished her, to remain until she may seek advice from Hecate. Jason swears to her—for she meets him and reminds him of their former and mad love—that he marries Creusa only for political reasons; that he will leave her his wedding night to seek Medea's arms. Medea waits, and waits in vain. The moon is turned to blood. The wedding feast is over; the lights in the palace are extinguished; the doors of the palace are closed. Then, furious, Medea contrives the awful presents that will destroy Creon, her rival, Jason, and the children. Then, then she will rise triumphant, the sorceress, in her mountain-car and ascend to the Sun, her father.

It is a pity that some clue to this music was not given in the program book; for this music was originally scenic and it is only fair toward the composer that the hearer in concert should have some idea of the composer's intention.

It is also a pity that the more important works of d'Indy have not been played here. We know him only by his beautiful symphonic poem "Istar" and some chamber music. We have not heard his "Wallenstein," which was performed in New York under Seidl in 1888; "Sauge fleuri;" "La Forêt enchantée;" the symphony on a Mountain Air; the suite in D for trumpet, two flutes; or the Fantaisie on French folk songs for oboe and orchestra which was played with Mr. Longy as soloist in Paris Dec. 12, 1897. But it is a fashion in Boston to introduce serious composers through their works of minor importance; Witness Bourgault-Ducoudray with his little "Burial of Ophelia" and Glazounoff with his juvenile "Lyric Peom."

The "Medea" suite disappointed on the whole—and yet it seems unfair to judge the music taken from its proper frame and played none too well; for there was a feeling of insecurity in the ensemble and a lack of finenesse in the detail. The first prelude suggests at the beginning a scholarly and ingenious burlesque on a well-known—too well-known progression in "Tristan"—a pompous, swollen burlesque of inversion. The dance is of forced piquancy, yet not without an appeal to immediate popularity. The first section of "Medea Waiting" is of true beauty and decided mood. But in "Medea and Jason" I found no real passion, either flaming in modern fashion, or repressed as in the music of Gluck, the great master of musical classical tragedy. How this whole suite of d'Indy shrinks and is as nothing in comparison with the overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," which is saturated with the spirit of Greek tragedy! You may answer, "But d'Indy was writing his music to a Greek tragedy as Mendès understood it." Yes, but on the other hand, Medea as played by Bernhardt was still a classic figure, and even if the story was subtly modernized, is it too much to ask for one theme of intense passion or one movement that recalls the frozen frenzy of a frieze? Then the final movement, "The Auroral Triumph"—where a solemn hymn is trampled under the feet of the racing Valkyries! This suite as concert music is weak in thematic invention, forced and labored in harmonic treatment. Orchestration, no matter how ingenious, will not redeem a serious work that is fundamentally without depth or passion.

⁂

The "Oxford" Symphony was written in 1788, the year of the "Children's" Symphony, and it was written for Paris. When Haydn went to Oxford in 1791 to be made a Mus. Doc. he took another symphony with him for the occasion; but there was not time enough to rehearse it, so he fell back on one already known, the one now called the Oxford. The Morning Chronicle a few days after the performance said: "A more wonderful composition never was heard. The merit of the work in the opinion of all the musicians present exceeded all praise." Wonderful no doubt it was in 1791, and the finale may still be heard with pleasure. I wish that Mr. Gericke would some day try the experiment of playing a Haydn Symphony with the number of strings usual in Haydn's more advanced period.

Ternina was warmly greeted and loudly applauded. Seldom does a great dramatic singer appear to full advantage in concert, and Ternina is not an exception in this respect. She displayed often beauty in tone and vocal skill, breadth of phrasing and intelligence in the broadest sense; and yet there was the constant thought: "Would this were in the opera itself!" The aria from "Fidelio" suffers when it is paraded in the heartless concert hall, and what singer can stand up against the orchestral fury of Wagner when it rages above the stage and not below it? Ternina is a woman that is not given to screaming; she is one of the very few singers in German opera that know the difference between singing and screaming and know how to sing. But last night there were times when she was obliged either to scream or to stand there, inaudible.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 12, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fifteenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, "Oxford."
Beethoven: Scena, "Abscheulicher!" and Aria, "Komm', Hoffnung," from "Fidelio."
D'Indy: "Médée," Suite d'Orchestre, d'après la Tragédie de Catulle Mendès, opus 47. (First time in Boston.)
Wagner: Closing Scene from "Götterdämmerung."
Miss Milka Ternina was the singer.

Although the "Oxford" sympathy was not written for the occasion, one can see why Haydn chose it for performance at Oxford when he was given the degree of Mus. Doc. by the university. He was lucky to have such a work in his trunk—not having time to write a new one; for it is one of the most elaborately developed of his symphonies, one of the most "learned," as the phrase goes, and well fitted to celebrate academic honors. On the other hand, it is one of the freest, the least academic in form; and, in this respect, may be taken as a sort of manifesto of artistic independence on Haydn's part—as much as to say: "The great university may honor my musical learning and skill, but it shall not presume to tell my genius what it shall do, or not do!"

Was it mere imagination, or was there some real reason for my finding Haydn less his best self in the elaborate contrapuntal developments of this work than in many of his simpler symphonies? That he was skilled musician enough to find himself perfectly at home and at ease in the style, may go without saying; but to be at home is one thing, to be in one's best and most characteristic vein, another. Certainly I seemed to find here the Haydn of "Achieved is the glorious work," strong, if you will, but inviting comparisons with Handel, not wholly to his own advantage, rather than the Haydn of "A new-created world," supreme in his own way, imitable by no one. For another thing, I cannot remember hearing anything else by Haydn in which there was so much of Mozart.

The performance was one of the most stinging slaps in the face of our present fashion of giving the older orchestral classics in big halls, with over-large orchestras. I have little sympathy with the idea of reducing the number of strings to the old Haydn standard; Haydn's small orchestra would be lost in the Music Hall. Yet, with our large orchestra, it was noticeable that, in the strong tutti-passages, the brass held its own to perfection against the strings, but, in softer passages, the strings were all out of balance with the wood-wind. Now, in a hall of the proper size for this class of music, a small body of strings can be in quite as good balance with the brass in fortissimo as our large mass of strings is in the Music Hall; but the balance between strings and the softer wood-wind will be equally good, which it can never be, in any hall, when the strings so largely outnumber the wind instruments.

Vincent d'Indy's "Médée" suite is a poser! I happened to hear the whole of it at a working rehearsal—not the most coherent way of hearing new music—and it sounded like the dreariest bosh, without an idea in it. At the concert it sounded better; atrociously ugly, if you will, but one could catch a glimpse of latent strength in it. My first impulse of abhorrence was somehow toned down by the thought that, very probably, the prelude to Wagner's "Tristan" sounded much like that to, say, Ignaz Moscheles, when he first heard it. The very fact that this suite is about the worst-sounding music I ever heard gives me pause; that is the way great and original works do sound, at first. To be sure, this is no sign of greatness, for execrably bad and mean works sound no better; but it is one of the wellnigh inevitable concomitants of greatness and originality. Distrust the new work that begins by caressing the ear; also distrust your first impression of the one that begins by being rude to it. I am willing to wait; the time may come when I shall be on my knees before this suite. Only of one thing am I tolerably certain now: the "apothesis" of the whole, the last part of the "Triomphe Auroral," is poor and weak.

Miss Ternina was most warmly received. I cannot help regretting that she, or anyone, should sing Beethoven's "Abscheulicher" on the concert-stage today. It loses by being taken out from its proper frame. Then, it is no novelty, and one can afford to wait until some opera company sees fit to give "Fidelio" here. The soprano concert repertory with orchestra is tolerably large, and there is much in it with which we are not familiar. With the Wagner things it is different; the great scenes in his music-dramas which absolutely need the singer's coöperation, and cannot be given merely orchestrally, have not been heard here so often that a chance to hear them again, even on the concert platform, is not a boon. Besides, it is—to me, at least— infinitely interesting to hear a thing like the last scene in "Götterdämmerung" so given that you can give the music your undivided attention, undistracted by inadequate stage setting and clumsy management. When we have seen this scene thoroughly well given on the stage, with all Wagner's directions adequately carried out, it may be time to think of banishing it from the concert-room; but, until then, I must say that I prefer it as a concert piece. Yes, in all but one respect. The orchestral part, when played as it was on Saturday evening, with a full Wagnerian orchestra, absolutely needs the "mystic gulf," the sunken orchestra; such tremendous scoring cannot be given straight out into the hall without prejudice to the singer. Wagner calculated all this very exactly; the sunken orchestra is a necessary part of his scheme. Even in an opera house the uncovered orchestra is bad; and on the concert stage, where all the wood-wind, all the trumpets and trombones, play straight out into the hall—and not sideways, as they do in opera—it is still worse. The correct dynamic balance of the parts is gone. Moreover, nearly everything has to be played timidly, without frank expressiveness, or else the singer is drowned out. It is all wrong and askew. As in a violin concerto, you breathe freely when the tuttis come!

On Saturday evening Mr. Gericke and the orchestra—which was complete, save for the single harp, instead of six—did their best to give Miss Ternina a fair chance; at times successfully, but at others she was inaudible. One could comfort one's self for this by appreciating that she held fast by legitimate singing, and refused to scream; it is better not to be heard than to yell, and Miss Ternina maintained the dignity of her artisthood throughout. Her voice was not at its best, somewhat clouded by that New England air to which she seems unable to inure herself. But, in technical excellence of singing, beauty of phrasing and expression, in that warmth of genius which is indestructibly hers, she was magnificent indeed. Refinement is a much-abused word; but here is an artist who combines force and passion with the highest sort of refinement. She was rapturously applauded and repeatedly recalled.

The next programme is: Berlioz, overture to "Le Roi Léar," opus 4; Mendelssohn, concerto for violin, in E-minor, opus 64; César Franck, "Les Eolides" (first time in Boston); Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D-major, opus 73. Miss Leonora Jackson will be the violinist.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1900.

ONE of the effective concerts of the season was given last night by the Boston Symphony, in which Gericke ranged with wonderful effect from the classicality of Haydn into the fervid and fervent modernity of Wagner and D'Indy. Ternina was the soloist.

The program:

Symphony in G major..Haydn
Scena, Abscheulicher! and aria, Komm', Hoffnung, from Fidelio, op. 72..Beethoven
Médée, suite orchestre, d'après la tragédie de Catulle Mendès, op. 47..D'Indy
(First time in Boston.)
Closing scene from Götterdämmerung..Wagner

The Suite of D'Indy is a remarkable composite of the French and German styles; there is much cacophony, but cacophony like caviare is an acquired taste, and the work is undeniably masterful.

The Wagner Finale was stupendous, and was given with all the wealth of color, tone and resources of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Leonora Jackson will be the next soloist.

* * *

N JOURNAL—TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 13,

BOSTON'S FINANCIERS. (I.)

HENRY LEE HIGGINSON.

Of Lee, Higginson & Co.

(From "New York Stock Exchange Views," copyrighted, 1897, by Moses King, N. Y.)

[illegible]S WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

LEONORA JACKSON.

Leonora Jackson, the violinist, who plays with the Symphony Orchestra, this week, was born 22 years ago in this city. Her mother studied singing in Italy, and is thoroughly musical. Miss Jackson's earlier life was spent in Chicago, where she studied the violin with Jacobson, Ruff and Carl Becker. In 1891 she went to Paris, where she studied a year under Leon Desjardins. The family met with pecuniary misfortune, and in 1892 and 1893 Leonora played at summer resorts along the New England coast and in the White Mountains, in order to gain money that she might continue her studies. Friends came to her help, and a fund was raised by admirers in Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New York, Philadelphia, Washington. She went to Berlin, where she studied under Joachim. Her first appearance in public was in that city, Oct. 17, 1896, with the Philharmonic Orchestra, led by her teacher. She played Wieniawski's D minor concerto, Brahms's concerto, and Ernst's Hungarian Rhapsody. In 1897 she took the Mendelssohn prize of 1500 marks, which had been taken before her by an American girl, Geraldine Morgan. During the last two years Miss Jackson has played in many European cities with great success, at leading concerts in London, Paris, Leipzig, Munich, Geneva, Antwerp, etc. Her first appearance in the United States was at New York, with the Philharmonic Society, Jan. 5, 1900, when she played Brahms's concerto.

The Fall River Daily Herald

HERALD BUILDING, 231 and 233 POCASSET STREET.

THURSDAY, FEB. 15, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Unusually Large Audience Greets the Famous Organization.

There was an unusually large attendance at the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Academy of Music last evening, and the organization will have no reason to entertain the proposition to transfer the annual Fall River date to any other city, as was done last year. The conductor was Wilhelm Gericke, whose return to the leadership of the organization was a matter of much satisfaction to its friends. All the grand harmony and delicate shading and the splendid technique that have made the orchestra world-famed were manifest as usual in last night's performance. The programme was made up of music of a somewhat lighter vein than that of former symphony programmes and was greatly enjoyed.

The appearance of Miss Leonora Jackson, violin soloist, was awaited with much interest. It is safe to say that she upheld the reputation which the very kind things that had been printed about her had established for her in this city. Her playing of Mendelssohn's concerto, Opus 64, was rewarded with round after round of applause, which the young artiste acknowledged with bows. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.

Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin, in E minor, op. 64.
- I. Allegro molto appassionato.
- II. Andante.
- III. Allegretto non troppo.—Allegro molto vivace.

Brahms—Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.
- I. Allegro molto.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Vivace.

(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow.)

Moszkowski—Four movements from suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
- I. Allegro molto e brioso.
- II. Allegretto giojoso.
- III. Tema con Variazioni; Andante.
- V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, FEB. 18, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A young and gifted girl, whose friends in her native city and elsewhere have followed with interest and pride her successes as a violinist abroad as well as at home, was welcomed with peculiar warmth at last week's symphony concerts. Miss Leonora Jackson's fame had preceded her, and on the occasion of her appearance on our concert stage, Music hall was crowded by an appreciative company.

For so young an artist, Miss Jackson displays remarkable power in her playing and seems to be able to gain extraordinary effects without the slightest apparent effect. Her technical skill is of the highest order; her command of expression, as evidenced in the beautiful and familiar Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, might well be envied by many a virtuoso of high repute and much experience.

As regards purity of tone Miss Jackson also merits cordial praise. Altogether, what with her unaffected style of playing and her modest, graceful bearing she fairly conquered her first audience in Boston and gained recall after recall. Miss Jackson has good reason to feel well pleased at her reception by Boston's symphony assemblages. The orchestra's accompaniment was a constant delight.

Berlioz' King Lear overture, with its wealth of orchestral effects, proved an ber for Mr Gericke's 16th program ber for Mr Gerick's 16th program. Brahm's symphony No. 2, in D minor, which brought it to a close, was played with a vigor and sureness that could not well have been surpassed. One can scarcely realize, after such a masterly interpretation, that Brahm was ranked by name as tedious and obscure, even at his best, not so many seasons ago, in America.

The novelty of the offering was Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Æolidæ," as the program had it. It was in the poem "Les Eolides," by Leconte de Lisle, that the Belgian composer sought his inspiration for his tone picture of love-sighs and love-longings. Certainly he limned an effective and pleasing work, utilizing to a remarkable degree the resources of the modern orchestra. One who seeks to find, verse by verse, a localized, melodic setting of De Lisle's poem, will find his theory hedged about with difficulties, but the general intent by many as tedious and obscure, even "to the general." The symphonic poem was performed with more than usual grace and skill.

There will be no Symphony rehearsal and concert this week. On the orchestra's reentrance, March 2, the program will include Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, a suite from Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulis," Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture and Schumann's Fourth symphony.

Boston Post.

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY [illegible]

SYMPHONY.

Franck's "Eolides" the Novelty.

Leonora Jackson the Solo Violinist.

She Plays Mendelssohn's Concerto.

The program of the 16th Symphony Concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "King Lear"	Berlioz
Concerto for violin	Mendelssohn
"Les Eolides"	César Franck
Symphony No. 2	Brahms

César Franck was moved to write his symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," by four lines of a poem by Leconte de Lisle:

> "O brises flottantes des cieux,
> Du beau printemps douces haleines,
> Qui de baisers capricieux
> Caressez les monts et les plaines."

Which Mr. Apthrop translates as follows: "O, floating breezes of the skies, sweet breaths of the fair spring, that caress the hills and plains with freakish kisses." Franck had no idea of picturing in tones the whole of the moderately long poem.

The piece was first played May 13, 1877, at a concert of the Société Nationale, led by Colonne; it was loudly praised. Lamoureux performed it Feb. 26, 1882, when it was hissed, and he was so angry—not at the audience, but at the composer—that he did not again put it on a program until Feb. 18, 1894, after the composer was dead—and famous. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago in 1895, repeated it in 1898, and led it in New York when the Chicago orchestra visited that city.

It is a curious piece. A chromatic theme—it is rather a sigh, as Mr. Apthorp says—is repeated over and over again, and when it is not repeated the varying phrases are of almost similar character. This slight material is managed with admirable skill. The modulations are ingenious, and, however surprising, are never forced. The orchestration is beautiful. The whole work is clear, fanciful, poetic; but I can well see how the average hearer who likes his music either sentimentally simple or piping hot would find this musical description of the five daughters of Aeolus monotonous.

⁂

After Berlioz had transcribed Weber's all too familiar waltz for the orchestra, came Weingartner with his polyphonic assault on the famous old tune. After Berlioz had written a "King Lear" overture, came Weingartner with an orchestral piece, similarly entitled. The latter has never been played in Boston. It might be well to play it—for the glory of Berlioz. It is true that this overture as a whole is not Berlioz at the height of his wild imagination, and yet the composer provokes a mood with the very first recitative. And how moving, how pathetic are the solos given to the oboe! Melody was not the distinguishing characteristic of this great poet who chose the orchestra as his medium; but although his melody is often painfully thought out, it is often poignant, irresistible. I have heard more tumultuous, more passionate performances of this overture than that of last night, which, however, gave genuine pleasure and strengthened my admiration for even Berlioz the younger.

⁂

Miss Leonora Jackson, who played here for the first time, was welcomed warmly and applauded heartily. Perhaps local pride had something to do with the unmistakable approval of the people. Her performance did not justify the extravagant foreign press notices that were industriously supplied for two years or so to American managers and critics by her agents in Europe. She has had sound training in certain directions. Her bowing is excellent and the foundations of her general technic have been well laid; she has evidently studied hard and with commendable ambition. The concerto itself does not call for any true depth of emotional display. The sentiment is amiable and genteel, with a dash of becoming melancholy, and the strength is the conventional strength of a man who in music had little virility. Beautifully made, a polished piece of mechanism, the concerto always, under favorable conditions, interests and promotes contagious good feeling. A player of unmistakable temperament will make himself known even in this concerto. I do not say that Miss Jackson has little or no temperament; I do say that she did not betray this quality to any noticeable degree last night. Her performance was pleasant, often commendable, generally creditable. It was not a great performance; and, if the player was at her best, I wonder at the foreign press notices. There is this to be said in behalf of Miss Jackson: She has been playing in many concerts since she came to this country, too many for her own good, for she has not the physique to undergo successfully such a strain. I should like to hear her in a smaller hall and in a varied program. She certainly gives much promise, and her career will be watched with interest.

[illegible] strength that conductors [illegible] prefer to ignore. As I am just beginning to like some things by Brahms, I left after this movement, fearing that my enjoyment might be marred; for after half-past nine Brahms is a man who has too much too say; and he also has a habit of holding your button and talking on profound subjects through his beard. I admit that in the second symphony his conversation is free and delightful. If only he had begun to talk earlier in the evening!

Philip Hale.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. FEB. 17, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One cannot help thinking on hearing Berlioz's overture to King Lear that had he written it later—without the pleasant surroundings "the balmy air of Nice" the orange groves, the blue sea and the mountains—that we should have had a more sombre setting for the story of the wronged and suffering [illegible] monarch. As it is, the pathetic Cordelia element seems to overbear the tempestuous and tragic as symbolized by King Lear.

Mendelssohn's violin concerto beloved of violinists and an ever-welcome addition to a musical feast on this occasion derived new interest through its interpretation at the hands of our young country woman Miss Leonora Jackson whose great talent has received its encouragement and development through the best teachers and the most untiring industry.

The pure, full tone, the masterly bowing, intelligent phrasing and sympathetic feeling made her performance a delight and the audience was not backward in showing its appreciation, recalling her again and again.

Les Eolides heard for the first time in Boston is from a poem by Lecomte de Lisle, but it is evident the composer has only taken the general idea of the daughters of Eolus, sweeping through the air, now fiercely now wooingly soft and sweetly murmuring. It is scored by a master hand and is rich in harmonic fancy. It was charmingly read and played.

Brahms D Major symphony was [illegible] rendered and seemed in one movement at least to contain the suggestion of two compositions that preceded it, since in the andante one could find the storm and stress that enveloped the unhappy Lear while the plaintive [illegible] of the winds, rising and falling, were clearly to be heard.

NAL—FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1900

HIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

LEONORA JACKSON.

Leonora Jackson, the violinist, who plays with the Symphony Orchestra, this week, was born 22 years ago in this city. Her mother studied singing in Italy, and is thoroughly musical. Miss Jackson's earlier life was spent in Chicago, where she studied the violin with Jacobson, Ruff and Carl Becker. In 1891 she went to Paris, where she studied a year under Leon Desjardins. The family met with pecuniary misfortune, and in 1892 and 1893 Leonora played at summer resorts along the New England coast and in the White Mountains, in order to gain money that she might continue her studies. Friends came to her help, and a fund was raised by admirers in Boston, Chicago, Cincinnati, New York, Philadelphia, Washington. She went to Berlin, where she studied under Joachim. Her first appearance in public was in that city, Oct. 17, 1896, with the Philharmonic Orchestra, led by her teacher. She played Wieniawski's D minor concerto, Brahms's concerto, and Ernst's Hungarian Rhapsody. In 1897 she took the Mendelssohn prize of 1500 marks, which had been taken before her by an American girl, Geraldine Morgan. During the last two years Miss Jackson has played in many European cities with great success, at leading concerts in London, Paris, Leipzig, Munich, Geneva, Antwerp, etc. Her first appearance in the United States was at New York, with the Philharmonic Society, Jan. 5, 1900, when she played Brahms's concerto.

The Fall River Daily Herald
HERALD BUILDING, 231 and 233
POCASSET STREET.

THURSDAY, FEB. 15, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Unusually Large Audience Greets the Famous Organization.

There was an unusually large attendance at the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Academy of Music last evening, and the organization will have no reason to entertain the proposition to transfer the annual Fall River date to any other city, as was done last year. The conductor was Wilhelm Gericke, whose return to the leadership of the organization was a matter of much satisfaction to its friends. All the grand harmony and delicate shading and the splendid technique that have made the orchestra world-famed were manifest as usual in last night's performance. The programme was made up of music of a somewhat lighter vein than that of former symphony programmes and was greatly enjoyed.

The appearance of Miss Leonora Jackson, violin soloist, was awaited with much interest. It is safe to say that she upheld the reputation which the very kind things that had been printed about her had established for her in this city. Her playing of Mendelssohn's concerto, Opus 64, was rewarded with round after round of applause, which the young artiste acknowledged with bows. The programme was as follows:

Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," op. 84.
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin, in E minor, op. 64.
 I. Allegro molto appassionato.
 II. Andante.
 III. Allegretto non troppo.—Allegro molto vivace.
Brahms—Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.
 I. Allegro molto.
 II. Allegretto.
 III. Vivace.
(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow.)
Moszkowski—Four movements from suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
 I. Allegro molto e brioso.
 II. Allegretto giojoso.
 III. Tema con Variazioni: Andante.
 V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, FEB. 18, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A young and gifted girl, whose friends in her native city and elsewhere have followed with interest and pride her successes as a violinist abroad as well as at home, was welcomed with peculiar warmth at last week's symphony concerts. Miss Leonora Jackson's fame had preceded her, and on the occasion of her appearance on our concert stage, Music hall was crowded by an appreciative company.

For so young an artist, Miss Jackson displays remarkable power in her playing and seems to be able to gain extraordinary effects without the slightest apparent effect. Her technical skill is of the highest order; her command of expression, as evidenced in the beautiful and familiar Mendelssohn concerto in E minor, might well be envied by many a virtuoso of high repute and much experience.

As regards purity of tone Miss Jackson also merits cordial praise. Altogether, what with her unaffected style of playing and her modest, graceful bearing she fairly conquered her first audience in Boston and gained recall after recall. Miss Jackson has good reason to feel well pleased at her reception by Boston's symphony assemblages. The orchestra's accompaniment was a constant delight.

Berlioz' King Lear overture, with its wealth of orchestral effects, proved an ber for Mr Gericke's 16th program. ber for Mr Gerick's 16th program. Brahm's symphony No. 2, in D minor, which brought it to a close, was played with a vigor and sureness that could not well have been surpassed. One can scarcely realize, after such a masterly interpretation, that Brahm was ranked by name as tedious and obscure, even at his best, not so many seasons ago, in America.

The novelty of the offering was Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Æolidæ," as the program had it. It was in the poem "Les Eolides," by Leconte de Lisle, that the Belgian composer sought his inspiration for his tone picture of love-sighs and love-longings. Certainly he limned an effective and pleasing work, utilizing to a remarkable degree the resources of the modern orchestra. One who seeks to find, verse by verse, a localized, melodic setting of De Lisle's poem, will find his theory hedged about with difficulties, but the general intent by many as tedious and obscure, even "to the general." The symphonic poem was performed with more than usual grace and skill.

There will be no Symphony rehearsal and concert this week. On the orchestra's reentrance, March 2, the program will include Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, a suite from Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulis," Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture and Schumann's Fourth symphony.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1900.

SYMPHONY.

Franck's "Eolides" the Novelty.

Leonora Jackson the Solo Violinist.

She Plays Mendelssohn's Concerto.

The program of the 16th Symphony Concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "King Lear"	Berlioz
Concerto for violin	Mendelssohn
"Les Eolides"	César Franck
Symphony No. 2	Brahms

César Franck was moved to write his symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," by four lines of a poem by Leconte de Lisle:

> "O brises flottantes des cieux,
> Du beau printemps douces haleines,
> Qui de baisers capricieux
> Caressez les monts ét les plaines."

Which Mr. Apthrop translates as follows: "O, floating breezes of the skies, sweet breaths of the fair spring, that caress the hills and plains with freakish kisses." Franck had no idea of picturing in tones the whole of the moderately long poem.

The piece was first played May 13, 1877, at a concert of the Société Nationale, led by Colonne; it was loudly praised. Lamoureux performed it Feb. 26, 1882, when it was hissed, and he was so angry—not at the audience, but at the composer—that he did not again put it on a program until Feb. 18, 1894, after the composer was dead—and famous. Theodore Thomas produced it in Chicago in 1895, repeated it in 1898, and led it in New York when the Chicago orchestra visited that city.

It is a curious piece. A chromatic theme—it is rather a sigh, as Mr. Apthorp says—is repeated over and over again, and when it is not repeated the varying phrases are of almost similar character. This slight material is managed with admirable skill. The modulations are ingenious, and, however surprising, are never forced. The orchestration is beautiful. The whole work is clear, fanciful, poetic; but I can well see how the average hearer who likes his music either sentimentally simple or piping hot would find this musical description of the five daughters of Aeolus monotonous.

⁂

After Berlioz had transcribed Weber's all too familiar waltz for the orchestra, came Weingartner with his polyphonic assault on the famous old tune. After Berlioz had written a "King Lear" overture, came Weingartner with an orchestral piece, similarly entitled. The latter has never been played in Boston. It might be well to play it—for the glory of Berlioz. It is true that this overture as a whole is not Berlioz at the height of his wild imagination, and yet the composer provokes a mood with the very first recitative. And how moving, how pathetic are the solos given to the oboe! Melody was not the distinguishing characteristic of this great poet who chose the orchestra as his medium; but although his melody is often painfully thought out, it is often poignant, irresistible. I have heard more tumultuous, more passionate performances of this overture than that of last night, which, however, gave genuine pleasure and strengthened my admiration for even Berlioz the younger.

⁂

Miss Leonora Jackson, who played here for the first time, was welcomed warmly and applauded heartily. Perhaps local pride had something to do with the unmistakable approval of the people. Her performance did not justify the extravagant foreign press notices that were industriously supplied for two years or so to American managers and critics by her agents in Europe. She has had sound training in certain directions. Her bowing is excellent and the foundations of her general technic have been well laid; she has evidently studied hard and with commendable ambition. The concerto itself does not call for any true depth of emotional display. The sentiment is amiable and genteel, with a dash of becoming melancholy, and the strength is the conventional strength of a man who in music had little virility. Beautifully made, a polished piece of mechanism, the concerto always, under favorable conditions, interests and promotes contagious good feeling. A player of unmistakable temperament will make himself known even in this concerto. I do not say that Miss Jackson has little or no temperament; I do say that she did not betray this quality to any noticeable degree last night. Her performance was pleasant, often commendable, generally creditable. It was not a great performance; and, if the player was at her best, I wonder at the foreign press notices. There is this to be said in behalf of Miss Jackson: She has been playing in many concerts since she came to this country, too many for her own good, for she has not the physique to undergo successfully such a strain. I should like to hear her in a smaller hall and in a varied program. She certainly gives much promise, and her career will be watched with interest.

The second symphony of Brahms is one of his most genial works. I use the word "genial" in the English, not the German sense. The first movement was thoughtfully read, and Mr. Gericke recognized in it an element of strength that conductors often prefer to ignore. As I am just beginning to like some things by Brahms, I left after this movement, fearing that my enjoyment might be marred; for after half-past nine Brahms is a man who has too much too say; and he also has a habit of holding your button and talking on profound subjects through his beard. I admit that in the second symphony his conversation is free and delightful. If only he had begun to talk earlier in the evening!

Philip Hale.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. FEB. 17, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

One cannot help thinking on hearing Berlioz's overture to King Lear that had he written it later—without the pleasant surroundings "the balmy air of Nice" the orange groves, the blue sea and the mountains—that we should have had a more sombre setting for the story of the wronged and suffering old monarch. As it is, the pathetic Cordelia element seems to overbear the tempestuous and tragic as symbolized by King Lear.

Mendelssohn's violin concerto beloved of violinists and an ever-welcome addition to a musical feast on this occasion derived new interest through its interpretation at the hands of our young country woman Miss Leonora Jackson whose great talent has received its encouragement and development through the best teachers and the most untiring industry.

The pure, full tone, the masterly bowing, intelligent phrasing and sympathetic feeling made her performance a delight and the audience was not backward in showing its appreciation, recalling her again and again.

Les Eolides heard for the first time in Boston is from a poem by Lecomte de Lisle, but it is evident the composer has only taken the general idea of the daughters of Eolus, sweeping through the air, now fiercely now wooingly soft and sweetly murmuring. It is scored by a master hand and is rich in harmonic fancy. It was charmingly read and played.

Brahms D Major symphony was splendidly rendered and seemed in one movement at least to contain the suggestion of two compositions that preceded it, since in the andante one could find the storm and stress that enveloped the unhappy Lear while the plaintive sighings of the winds, rising and falling, were clearly to be heard.

[72]

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 49.
SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Young American Violinist Is Given a Cordial Greeting.

Miss Leonora Jackson, Who Has Studied Abroad, Receives Several Recalls—The First Performance in Boston of a Symphonic Poem by Cesar Franck.

The programme for last evening's concert—the 16th in this season's series—by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was:

Overture to "King Lear," op. 4........Berlioz
Concerto for violin, op. 64........Mendelssohn
Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"...Cesar Franck
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73....Brahms

The soloist was Miss Leonora Jackson, of whose artistic career abroad her native country has been kept informed so industriously for the past few years. It is to be feared that the methods pursued by the talented young lady's enthusiastic press agent were not wholly judicious, for they gave rise to expectations that were not quite realized by her performances on this occasion. Miss Jackson is a young artist of decided merit. Her tone is very small, too small to prove effective in so spacious an auditorium as that of Music Hall. It is, however, pure, and her intonation is admirable. She bows with largeness, freedom and grace, and her technique is able and fluent. Her style is intelligently artistic, and she plays with easy confidence.

Both her reading and her performance of the concerto was steadily meritorious, but there was nothing remarkable in it—at least, nothing to make comprehensible the almost nil ultra laudations that were circulated to herald her coming hither. She is evidently a very charming young lady, and certainly plays with brilliancy, good taste and carefully trained skill. In force, individuality and what is understood as temperament, she is at present lacking. It was all very elegant, even interesting by reason of its neatness and freedom from mere display for the sake of effect. That she has marked talent was made fully clear, and it would seem that her future, when she shall have attained to greater maturity in regard to style and sentiment, is well worth watching. She met with a very cordial welcome, and at the close of the concerto was applauded with extreme enthusiasm and recalled some four or five times.

The Cesar Franck work is the most readily understood music on a first hearing, that has been given here from this composer. On the whole it is almost genial. The theme is very brief and is repeated persistently from the beginning to the end of the piece, but the skill and originality of the harmonic progressions and the beauty and freshness of the orchestration prevent this singular reiteration of one short phrase from becoming wearisome.

In suave poetic feeling it is abundant, and this combined with a certain effect of grace and chastity in sentiment produces a charming impression. It was beautifully read and played, but did not appear to hit the taste of the audience, for the applause at its close was far from vigorous and general.

The Berlioz overture, which seems less interesting, and in some respects more commonplace, than it used to be, except for the clearness and beauty of the orchestration, obtained from Mr. Gericke a faultless interpretation, and was splendidly played by the orchestra. Brahms is always sure of sympathetic and loving treatment at the hands of both conductor and his players, and the performance of the symphony was no exception to the rule. Seldom, if ever, has the opening movement been given so clearly and its grace and tenderness more thoroughly brought out than they were last evening.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Leonore," Beethoven; suite from "Iphigenie en Aulis," Gluck; overture, "Hamlet," Tschaikowsky, and symphony No. 4, Schumann.

Miss Leonora Jackson created quite as much of a furore as was expected by her superb playing at the symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon and the concert last night. She looks young and rather delicate with her somewhat pale face and slender figure. She is a pure blonde, and although not a strictly pretty girl has a winsome face and one full of expression. Her bearing on the platform is modest and at the same time thoroughly self-possessed. Friday afternoon she was in a simple gown of pale blue, her only ornament an enamel star with a diamond centre given her by the Queen after she had played at Windsor by request. It is a souvenir which Miss Jackson shows with pride and naturally values exceedingly. Last night she had more color than she had on Friday afternoon, and looked prettier in consequence. She was in white crepe delicately embroidered in roses, with a tracery of vines. Miss Jackson's mother and brother are with her always. She plays with the Symphony orchestra in Baltimore Tuesday night. The musicians are leaving Boston tonight at 7 and will open tomorrow evening in Philadelphia with Ternina. For the rest of their trip Miss Jackson will be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, FEB. 19, 1900.

Symphony Concert---The Debut of Leonora Jackson.

The concert began with Berlioz's overture to "King Lear." We have not any great faith in the musical illustrations which the French give to "the divine Williams;" we recall many Gallic butcheries of our bard upon the Gallic stage; we have a vivid recollection of witnessing "Henry VIII." as retouched by St. Saens and Armand Sylvestre, and viewing short-skirted nymphs dancing Scotch reels in the "Parc de Richmon;" we recall seeing the "Tempest" worked up as a ballet by Ambroise Thomas, with Miranda and Ferdinand capering all over the stage, with Caliban grovelling to bassoon accompaniment, with angels and gnomes galore in the background. As yet there has been no attempt to turn Hamlet's soliloquy into a dance, or to introduce a ballet into Ophelia's funeral scene. Berlioz at least comes nearest of all French composers to the spirit of the poet; if he does not attain the fidelity of a Boito and Verdi, he at least does not contradict the sentiment of any scene or minimize the grandeur of the situation; his balcony scene is much truer to the idea of "Romeo and Juliet" than the sugar-water of Gounod can claim to be; and if, in this "King Lear" overture, he has produced some ugly music, it certainly suits well to the gloomy subject. A tender oboe theme, excellently played, suggested the gentle Cordelia, while a series of explosions on the kettle-drum might have conveyed any thought from lyddite bombs to the shocks of Fate. The tremendous crashes of horns, trumpets and trombones, near the end, were an unexpected carrying out of the line:—

> "Blow winds, and crack your cheeks!"

Spite of some striking contrasts, the overture must be ranked as decidedly inferior to the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and to the "Carnaval Romaine" overture by the same composer.

The chief interest of the concert centred in the debut of a new violinist, an American girl who has won decided triumphs abroad. With the excessive claims made for Miss Leonora Jackson by her agents, we have nothing to do; it is sufficient that she proved herself a thorough artist in many directions; pure intonation, clear harmonics, admirable surety and an elegance of style characterized her work. It is possible that something is lacking in abandon and passion, something yet to be desired in breadth, but this cannot be stated with certainty, for the Mendelssohn concerto, which was her letter of introduction, does not call for these qualities; it is one of the few famous violin concertos of the world because of its suavity and unstrained style, but it is a bit of Chesterfieldian music which scarcely deserves to rank with Bruch's G minor concerto, and shrivels up when compared with the Beethoven and Brahms violin concertos.

Miss Jackson played the cadenza with excellent effect and very nearly evoked applause in the middle of the work by it; Mendelssohn has here cleverly blocked the soloist from winning laurels at the expense of the composer, by placing the cadenza in the development of the first movement, instead of in its coda, where it belongs, so that the climax shall be a more musicianly one. This arrangement leads one to think that the cadenza may yet be abolished altogether. Mozart, who was always ready to make concessions to soloists, may be regarded as the father of this personal display of technique, but Beethoven and Brahms both have shown their antipathy to its perpetuation, and in the newer works the cadenza is becoming more and more rare.

The concerto seemed to present no difficulties to Miss Jackson, and she took the final movement at a flying pace, yet without any trace of blurring or of insecurity. The pensive character of the slow movement, a genteel sadness such as Thomas Moore brought into poetry and Mendelssohn often affects in music, was also charmingly brought out. In short, Miss Jackson has made as much of a success as the character of the composition would allow. She was recalled again and again, given floral tributes and in every way received a welcome that was memorable. We hope to hear her in other works, for the Mendelssohn concerto is by no means the yardstick that we should choose to measure an artist by.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Aeolides," followed: It is one of the most logical and intelligible compositions that we have yet heard from this composer. It might almost all be derived from two notes which are given at the outset. Spite of the almost constant development of these two and the succeeding three notes, monotony is avoided. The daughters of Aeolus are not pictured individually, but, judging from the manner in which the zephyrs sighed through the composition, we imagine that a Boston east wind was not among them. The work is not in any set form, the "symphonic" adjective here being used in the French sense and meaning merely "orchestral." The ingenuity of the development is the one chief charm of it all, for there are no striking contrasts or sudden transitions in it, and ("for this relief much thanks!") there are none of the modern strivings after tional catastrophes or hair-raising dissonances. It was interesting to have Berlioz and Cesar Franck on the same programme; it gave a good illustration of the scope of the modern French orchestral school.

Brahms no longer causes the exodus that he used to do in our symphonic concerts. It was, to be sure, not the best place in the world for the D major symphony, for its first movement is full of subtle development, and the audience had been given a very large dose of this treatment in Franck's work. But this second symphony is the most popular of the four, and the beauty of the third movement ("Allegretto Grazioso") gave abundant reward to those who were not wearied with too much figure-treatment. The whole symphony was excellently played; Mr. Gericke gives a certain strength and power to Brahms that one does not always hear, and that becomes him well. The careful detail-work of our conductor is never seen to such good advantage as in a Wagner score of a Brahms symphony. The concert that began with Gallo-Shakespearian agony ended with Teutonic peace and profundity.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Berlioz: Overture to "Le Roi Léar," opus 4.
Mendelssohn: Concerto for Violin, in E minor, opus 64.
César Franck: Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides."
(First time in Boston.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73.
Miss Leonora Jackson was the violinist.

The introduction to Berlioz's "King Lear" was grandly played; never have I heard its strong dramatic side more vividly brought out. That "sleep to death" of the kettledrums was in itself an inspiration; and how beautifully Mr. Longy played the pathetic oboe solo! One could well understand Berlioz exclaiming—on conducting a rehearsal of this overture, which he had not heard for ten or twelve years, at the Prince of Hohenzollern-Hechingen's chateau of Loewenberg—"Mais d'est foudroyant! comment, d'est moi qui ait fait cela?" But the beginning of the Allegro disperato ed agitato came like a dash of cold water; it was agitated, if you please, but there was no desperation in it. Never since I first heard this overture, under Pasdeloup in Paris, in 1869, have I heard this Allegro played with any effect. It has never sounded headlong and passionate; the first theme sounds merely academic, and the second theme weak—with a trivial, dance-hall lilt to the concluding phrase. I feel it in my bones that this Allegro can be made to sound very differently; on Saturday evening the proper desperate mood was hinted at only toward the end.

Franck's "Eolides" turns out to be thoroughly charming. Here is the right, the really poetic, way to write a symphonic poem! You feel that Franck had soaked himself through and through with the beauty of Leconte de Lisle's wonderful poem, had entered fully into the spirit of its underlying emotion, and then thrown it aside, to express that emotion in his own musical way, without troubling himself about details. He has eliminated all that was unessential, and sung of nothing but the breeze and the poet's joy in the breeze. The thing is as full of exquisite musical beauty as it is of poetry. With what genuine power has he not worked out his single musical idea! never leaving it for anything else, yet never for a moment giving you the impression of monotony, of poverty of invention. That single idea seems newer and fresher every time it is repeated. The work is in no wise tremendous, a work in half-tints, but there is true genius in it. It was admirably read and played, with convincing poetic insight and sympathy.

In Brahms's ever-delightful D major symphony Mr. Gericke and the orchestra fairly outdid themselves. Ah! there is no smell of mortality about that work. You can say of it, as Spurgeon once said of the grace of the Lord: "'T is like a round of beef; you can cut and come again!"

Few young violinists have come to us burdened with such a weight of reputation as Miss Leonora Jackson. Well, heavy as it is, she does not stagger under it. Not being a specialist, I cannot competently speak of her technique; only it takes no violinist to appreciate what a wonderful bow-arm she has—that anyone can see. But the searching beauty of her tone, the purity of her sentiment, her earnest concentration and fine musical instinct are of a very rare sort. She plays with authority, without a suspicion of bumptiousness. I think the maturity of her artistic development has been considerably overrated; she is still a young girl, feels like one, and plays as she feels. The Mendelssohn concerto contains much that is peculiarly adapted to a talent like hers, beside not a little that escapes such immaturity of perception. The work is at once very fresh and romantic and very mature in feeling; with all the "Unbescholtenheit," the unspoiled innocence of its sentiment, its underlying emotion is not that of sweet sixteen.

There is probably no other violin concerto in the whole list that has been so variously—and, upon the whole, so wrongly—conceived by modern violinists. Several have shown a certain greatness in it, but too seldom of the right sort. I forget how Sarasate played it; for his sharp E-string put all appreciation to flight. I should say that Wieniawski was the only one I ever heard give a really model performance. Camilla Urso runs him hard, but does not quite touch him. Perhaps the most penetratingly effective playing of it, and at the same time the very worst conception, was Teresina Tua's; she did the wrong thing in a peculiarly masterly way. When it came to that long-held high A, with the ensuing cadence in G major, at the close of the second theme, hall and audience vanished, and you found yourself alone with Teresina under the summer moon, with her sobbing "Pour toi je veux mourir" upon your breast—like Calvé in "Faust." A very romantic moment, but savoring in nothing of Mendelssohn, whose music was not made for desperate flirtations with boarding-school misses. After all, the great trouble with nearly all the playing of the E minor concerto we have heard here for years is that people are so terribly bent upon modernizing Mendelssohn—an entirely modern man, in his own day, but with a peculiarly ephemeral "modernity." If ever there were a man who had nothing whatever to do with the dominant musical spirit of our time, Mendelssohn was that man; it was diametrically opposed to everything in his nature, he would none of it and hated it. Mendelssohn, like old Sebastian Bach, had a metronome in his heart, and kept strict time with it in all he wrote. Play fast and loose with his regularity of rhythm, and you kill him outright, his heart stops beating. He was an intense man enough, but his intensity was not of the passionate sort; it was, for the most part, an intense joie de vivre, a high-strung nervous mood, not passion. Put passionate expression into his cantilena, with the rhythmical distortion that comes therewith, and you almost inevitably instil something of mere salon vulgarity into his phrases. The man was worth a great deal, in his way; but you should not make of him more than he was worth, least of all, what he was not worth. He might write "Allegro molto appassionato" at the head of a movement; but the player must not forget his personal equation, and should look at passion from his point of view.

It is not to be denied that Miss Jackson takes a good deal of the concerto in the Teresina Tua spirit; but with more sanity, with a finer sense of musical proportion. Then, when the Tua was here last, she was no chicken, and had a virtuosity in matters of expression which no young girl can have; there was no sophistication of sentimental appeal which she had not made her own. She was thoroughly a "fausse naive." Miss Jackson is still a good deal of a real naive, and goes to no lengths of sophistication. She seems a very intelligent, well-poised young person; I had a talk with her last evening, and was struck particularly with what she said of the Beethoven concerto: "Oh, you have to have three or four gray hairs before you can play that!" Now, I am the last to wish anyone gray hairs before her time; but I am sure that ten years hence Miss Jackson will be the first to smile at some of the things she does in the Mendelssohn concerto now. Her playing of the second movement is beautifully wrong. This andante is not the greatest music ever written; there are things in it which I personally abominate. In those octaves of the second theme Mendelssohn shows all his most disagreeable side; they make you feel ready to shed your last drop of blood to help the priests of Baal! But though not great, the thing sounds best when played right; the first theme is charming in grace and a certain tenderness of feeling, and ought to be played in strict time, with metronomic persistency of rhythm. Its emotion does not get beyond the lullaby point; try to make it dramatic, and you vulgarize it.

I have thus harped on Miss Jackson's immaturity because I find so much that is fine and genuine in her, so much that seems to show a potentiality of growth and ripening. All she needs is age; and there is no need of hothouse forcing. Let her grow up naturally. She has already had infinitely valuable experience in solo playing; she has reached the point where artists begin to develop themselves and forget the schoolmaster. And when one walks on one's own feet at her age, a little wrong-going is inevitable at first. With her talent and evident earnestness, her going right should be only a matter of time. As it is, she is eminently worth talking about; she is no zero, far from it.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 2, and Saturday evening, March 3, there being no rehearsal nor concert this week—is: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 3, opus 72; Gluck, suite from "Iphigénie en Aulide"; Tchaikovsky, overture to "Hamlet," opus 67; Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1900.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra presented another superb program and soloist on Saturday night and Friday afternoon. Miss Leonora Jackson, who has been long expected, at last made her initial appearance to a Boston audience, where she met with a glowing success.

Miss Jackson plays with astonishing ease and facility, her bowing is always graceful and her intonation clear.

Many of her effects were charming, and she delighted a large audience.

The program was full of charm; especially imposing was the magnificent presentation of the Brahms Symphony, which is replete with flowing melody, notwithstanding the claim of the anti-Brahmsites. "The Eolides" received a beautiful interpretation, and one which made the number very lucid. It is marked first time in Boston, but I believe it was played by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra at the great French program, which was given in New York with Pugno and Guilmant as soloists, in the season of 1897-98, as I had a distinct remembrance of the work, and believe that to have been the time I heard it.

The Berlioz Overture was a bit of that rich orchestration that is the glory of that Frenchman's work, and its solemnity and weirdness well fitted the subject of "King Lear." The program in its entirety was.

Overture, King Lear	Berlioz
Concerto for Violin	Mendelssohn
Les Eolides (First time.)	Franck
Symphony No. 2, in D major	Brahms

There will be no concerts next week in Boston, as the orchestra will be on tour.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE itinerary this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning to-day is:

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, to-day, at 2:30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, February 22, at 8 P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 23, at 8 P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8 P. M., Saturday, February 24.

For the concert of to-morrow night Miss Leonora Jackson will be the soloist. For this afternoon Sembrich has been engaged for $2,000 to sing two songs and of this, 50 per cent. goes to the Grau Opera Company or Grau. It is a first class legitimate business proposition calculated gradually to drive all American musicians to the poor house where they can sing in one great chorus a hymn of praise to the managers for their great interest in American musical art. Sembrich will not be sick this time.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

SEMBRICH IN CONCERT.

She Sings Gloriously With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Sembrich, entirely restored to health, was the soloist yesterday at the fourth matinée concert given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The audience was the largest seen at one of these concerts. The orchestra numbers were the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Anacreon," Schubert's unfinished symphony and three of Brahms's Hungarian dances. Mme. Sembrich was heard in the aria "L'Amero, Saro Costante," from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and "Casta Diva" from "Norma." This arrangement gave the earlier part of the programme rather a classical character. The combination of the Cherubini and Mozart numbers seemed in especially striking contrast to the music that followed.

Mme. Sembrich was at her glorious best yesterday. Her voice in the superior acoustics of the music hall seemed more brilliant than ever, and her singing of two such varied numbers as those she chose furnished a unique exhibition of her art as a singer. It was agreeable to a greater extent than it usually is to observe that this art when expended on material so worthy as Mozart's seems more marvellous than ever. No arrangements for an encore had been made, but Mr. Gericke, after Mme. Sembrich had been recalled half a dozen times, was compelled to repeat the last part of the "Norma" aria.

Virtuosity was represented yesterday at the [illegible] high estate. Mme. Sembrich's [illegible] was remarkable enough and was [illegible] achievements of the orchestra. [illegible] more than ever its right to be called a virtuoso orchestra. It played the Cherubini overture with the utmost finish and [illegible] and made a delight what might have afforded under other circumstances less ground for enjoyment. The unfinished Schubert symphony was played in faultless fashion. The performance of Brahms's Hungarian dances yesterday possessed, in addition to the care and finish with which they were played, just the spirit their successful performance requires. Miss Leonora Jackson is to be the soloist at this evening's concert.

MAIL AND EXPRESS

Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Classical Programme—"Tannhauser" at the Opera—George Grossmith Once More.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, gave the first of its two February concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the second being scheduled for to-night. Mme. Sembrich was the soloist yesterday, and Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, will appear in that capacity this evening. Both programmes had been made with a remembrance of the ultra modern character of those offered here last month by this admirable organization, and except for Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," which is to be played to-night, for the second time in this city, neither list contains anything new or recent.

The orchestral works performed yesterday were Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon," opus 241, Schubert's Unfinished symphony and three of Brahms's Hungarian dances, scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow. In keeping with this scheme, Mme. Sembrich's numbers were the aria, "L'amero, saro Costante," from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma."

Mr. Gericke's reading of the Schubert symphony was thoroughly delightful. Its lovely melodies were sung with spirit and grace under his baton and the orchestra warmly seconded him. There was just the right strength and vigor in those stern and wondrously impressive minor chords that break in upon the idyllic atmosphere of the first movement, and the whole performance was one to cause enthusiasm. The same could be said of the playing of the Cherubini overture, so rarely heard nowadays. The calm classicism of this product of 1803 is relieved by a certain freshness and spontaneity that still exerts a charm. As for the Brahms dances, the first two played yesterday would bear more frequent repetition here. The third is rather commonplace.

Mme. Sembrich, whose voice seemed scarcely at its usual strength, sang with that same rare art that has made her famous. Mozart has no more sympathetic and winning interpreter in these days than this Polish soprano. Her performance of the aria from "Il Re Pastore" aroused the wish to hear it oftener and at the same time explained why this wish could not be fulfilled, unless Mme. Sembrich herself could always be at hand to sing it. None but an absolute mistress of art dares essay such a task. "Casta Diva," too, went with the same exquisite rhythmic and tonal charm, and the audience demanded a reptition of the finale.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEB. 22, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Fourth Matinee of This Season at Carnegie Hall.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. There was a large audience, which went to some pains to make it clear that it was not there to hear the orchestra, but to pour out the plenitude of its worship at the feet of the soloist. This was one of the famous stars of the opera company, and wherever these stars go they draw after them a multitude of those emotional creatures whose lives are given over to the adoration of singers.

It is always a joy to hear Marcella Sembrich sing, but when she puts the Boston Symphony Orchestra into the background at one of its own concerts one cannot help feeling that she is accorded a too prominent position at that time. Yet it is no fault of hers that such is the case. It is the doing of the singer-worshippers in which this town abounds.

The programme yesterday afternoon consisted of Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, the aria "l'amero, saro Costante," from Mozart's "Il re Pastore," Schubert's unfinished symphony, the aria, "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma," and Brahms's Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2, and 6. Mme. Sembrich sang the two arias, and it may comfort many operagoers to know that she was in excellent voice, and sang with all her familiar spirit and her unfailing perfection of art. She repeated the cabaletta of the Bellini number in response to the prolonged demand for more. Although she sang it just as well the second time as she did the first, the applause which followed the repetition was almost inaudible. A repetition seemed not to be what the audience desired; it probably wished her to sing something more than she had agreed to sing.

The orchestra was in fine fettle yesterday. The weariness which ensues upon the night travel from Baltimore to this city was not to be discerned in the playing. The precision of the attack in the Cherubini overture was splendid, and the unanimity was such that the limpid clearness of the work was revealed in all its delightful perfection. As an example of the French classic style nothing is more admirable than this overture, and it sounded most refreshing yesterday.

Schubert's unfinished symphony has had a considerable rest. It has not been heard, if we mistake not, since it was performed under the direction of Mr. Seidl at the Astoria concerts. At any rate, it came with a sense of newness yesterday afternoon, and this was increased by the charming finish of the performance. The orchestra played the familiar measures with such mellow tone, such well-knit smoothness, and such undulatory nuancing that it was a presentation long to be remembered among the many which this composition has had in this city. The Brahms dances were the only part of the programme in which the work of the orchestra was not perfectly satisfactory, and there it did seem as if a little weariness had crept into the performance. All was clear and smooth, but there was a lack of dash and brilliancy. Mr. Gericke conducted all the music yesterday sympathetically.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The programme which Mr. Gericke provided yesterday for the fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra betrayed a desire, which has been more or less noticeable all season, to popularize these entertainments, as the phrase goes. A solo performer was provided, who was bound to prove attractive to everybody—to the keenly appreciative lover of the highest style of vocalization no less than to the merest curiosity hunter tempted by newspaper comment and gossip—and the orchestral numbers were of the kind that neither look formidable on the programme nor ask a strain on the attention for any considerable space of time continuously. Symphonic music there had to be, of course, but Mr. Gericke took refuge in that loveliest of musical torsos, Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. This, the overture to "Anacreon," by Cherubini, and three Hungarian dances, arranged by Brahms and orchestrated by him and Albert Parlow, constituted the frame in which Mme. Sembrich and her exquisite art were displayed. A lovely frame it was, and perhaps as appropriate a one as could have been found under the circumstances, for Mme. Sembrich and her selections fitted into it perfectly. The adorable woman sang the aria with violin obligato (admirably played by Mr. Kneisel) from Mozart's "Il Re pastore," which she gave here earlier in the season at one of the Sunday evening concerts, and "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma." She sang in her finest manner, and evoked much enthusiasm, to which she was obliged to respond by a repetition at the last, in spite of Mr. Gericke's rule that such things must not be. She repeated the conclusion of the Bellini air.

The Evening Post.

New York, Thursday, Feb. 22, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Sembrich was the soloist at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. An aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" (a little opera produced at Salzburg in 1775, when Mozart was only nineteen years of age), and Bellini's "Casta Diva" were her numbers, and she sang them with a luscious tone quality, and perfection of vocal art that were altogether admirable, evoking so much applause that Mr. Gericke was obliged to break the rule of the organization and permit a repetition of the last part of the scene from "Norma."

The orchestra itself has never been heard to better advantage. Even the Cherubini "Anacreon," with which time has not dealt kindly, was acceptable in such a polished classical performance. The two movements of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" were played most enchantingly, and one could not but marvel once more at the spontaneity and wealth of melody, the sensuous beauty of the orchestral coloring, and the novelty of the modulations in this great work—points in which Schubert excels Beethoven. The three best of Brahms's twenty-one Hungarian Dances, Nos, 1, 2, and 6, were subsequently played with much vivacity. At this evening's concert Miss Lenora Jackson will play the Mendelssohn violin concerto.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.

THE EVENING SUN, per month .20
THE EVENING SUN, per year $2.00

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth matinée attracted a great audience to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon and offered a programme decidedly out of the beaten path of Boston performances. The instrumental selections which were played yesterday were among the most graceful and captivating in all music of this sort, while the presence of Marcella Sembrich as soloist indicated the completeness of the management's new purpose in matinée musical entertainment.

If any listener was not pleased, he or she was quite lost in the tumult of applause that followed the singing of the "Casta Diva" from Bellini's "Norma." Mme. Sembrich was at her best yesterday and, after half a dozen recalls, Conductor Gericke was compelled to allow a partial repetition of this aria before the concert could proceed. The earlier aria, from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," had the help of Mr. Kneisel in violin obligato. Of the numbers for orchestra, the first on the programme was the overture of Cherubini's forgotten opera, "Anacreon," in which the brilliant passages for the violins gave fine opportunity for a display of virtuosity. The lovely "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert and three Hungarian dances, adapted by Brahms and scored for orchestra by that composer and Albert Parlow, completed the musical offering. There was nothing to ruffle the serenity of the most indolent of music-lovers, while at the same time the technical listener found abundant musical delight. Altogether it was an ideal matinée and one that perhaps no other orchestra and no other soloist could have excelled. There will be sterner stuff, musically speaking, in the fourth evening concert to-night, when one new work will be brought forward and the soloist will be Leonora Jackson.

Telegram.

HIGH WATER MARK

Circulation...... 330,900

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY

Fully recovered from her indisposition, Mme. Sembrich distinguished herself last night as the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, where she sang an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" [illegible] "Casta Diva" from Bellini's "Norma."

She gave these numbers with her usual faultless technique, at the same time imbuing the "Casta Diva" with its full dramatic significance. The applause which followed her singing was so prolonged that she would have been justified in giving encores for both numbers, but she contented herself with singing again only after the Bellini selection.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONC

Mme. Sembrich was the soloist [illegible] cert of the Boston Symphony [illegible] Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon. She sang an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and the "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma."

She gave these numbers with her usual faultless technique, at the same time imbuing the "Casta Diva" with its full dramatic significance. The applause which followed her singing was so prolonged that she would have been justified in giving encores for both numbers, but she contented herself with singing again only after the Bellini selection.

The most brilliant performances on the part of the orchestra were the three Hungarian dances by Brahms which brought the concert to a close. They were played in dashing style, with technical perfection and with true Magyar verve. For beauty of tone the second movement of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was prominent, while Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" was given with rugged strength.

The World.

hed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PA
New York.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

SEMBRICH IN CONCERT.

For once the master orchestra from Boston, conducted by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, took second place at one of its concerts. The occasion was the fourth matinee, given at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mme. Sembrich was the soloist, and as such overshadowed the instrumental achievements called for by the programme. Mr. Gericke must have foreseen this, for his offerings were scant in quantity, and, while agreeable in quality, possessed ordinary interest only. As it was, the concert, including two vocal numbers and an encore, lasted less than an hour and a half. Concerts as a rule are too long, but the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are so few and far apart that a two hours' function with more substantial matter would be more acceptable.

There were three orchestral selections—Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, and three of the twenty-one Hungarian dances in which Brahms in his lighter moods expressed his enthusiastic admiration for the national Magyar melodies.

The orchestra played superbly. In the Cherubini opus the violins negotiated the brilliant passages alloted to them with extraordinary virtuosity. The symphony, sympathetically read by Mr. Gericke, was interpreted with abeautiful tone, extreme suavity and finish. The second movement—the occurring clarinet solo of which was finely played—illustrated in eloquent manner the superlative qualities of this great orchestra.

In the Hungarian dances the characteristic spirit of the composition was fascinatingly expressed. The two oboists covered themselves with glory in the dainty theme which forms the backbone of the second dance.

Mme. Sembrich has never been in better or fresher voice and has never displayed to a fuller extent the virtues of her art. She sang a Mozart aria from "Il Re Pastore," with the violin obligato artistically played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and "Costa Diva" from Bellini's "Norma." Her perfections in tone production, phrasing, expression and execution were so completely revealed that they made a mockery of much of the singing that is heard during the season.

At to-night's concert the orchestra will play Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and Beethoven's eighth symphony, and Miss Leonora Jackson, the violinist, will be the soloist.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 21, 1900.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra presented another superb program and soloist on Saturday night and Friday afternoon. Miss Leonora Jackson, who has been long expected, at last made her initial appearance to a Boston audience, where she met with a glowing success.

Miss Jackson plays with astonishing ease and facility, her bowing is always graceful and her intonation clear.

Many of her effects were charming, and she delighted a large audience.

The program was full of charm; especially imposing was the magnificent presentation of the Brahms Symphony, which is replete with flowing melody, notwithstanding the claim of the anti-Brahmsites. "The Eolides" received a beautiful interpretation, and one which made the number very lucid. It is marked first time in Boston, but I believe it was played by Theodore Thomas and his orchestra at the great French program, which was given in New York with Pugno and Guilmant as soloists, in the season of 1897-98, as I had a distinct remembrance of the work, and believe that to have been the time I heard it.

The Berlioz Overture was a bit of that rich orchestration that is the glory of that Frenchman's work, and its solemnity and weirdness well fitted the subject of "King Lear." The program in its entirety was.

Overture, King Lear	Berlioz
Concerto for Violin	Mendelssohn
Les Eolides (First time.)	Franck
Symphony No. 2, in D major	Brahms

There will be no concerts next week in Boston, as the orchestra will be on tour.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

THE itinerary this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra beginning to-day is:

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, to-day, at 2:30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, February 22, at 8 P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, February 23, at 8 P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8 P. M., Saturday, February 24.

For the concert of to-morrow night Miss Leonora Jackson will be the soloist. For this afternoon Sembrich has been engaged for $2,000 to sing two songs and of this, 50 per cent. goes to the Grau Opera Company or Grau. It is a first class legitimate business proposition calculated gradually to drive all American musicians to the poor house where they can sing in one great chorus a hymn of praise to the managers for their great interest in American musical art. Sembrich will not be sick this time.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

SEMBRICH IN CONCERT.

She Sings Gloriously With the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Sembrich, entirely restored to health, was the soloist yesterday at the fourth matinée concert given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. The audience was the largest seen at one of these concerts. The orchestra numbers were the overture to Cherubini's opera, "Anacreon," Schubert's unfinished symphony and three of Brahms's Hungarian dances. Mme. Sembrich was heard in the aria "L'Amero, Saro Costante," from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and "Casta Diva" from "Norma." This arrangement gave the earlier part of the programme rather a classical character. The combination of the Cherubini and Mozart numbers seemed in especially striking contrast to the music that followed.

Mme. Sembrich was at her glorious best yesterday. Her voice in the superior acoustics of the music hall seemed more brilliant than ever, and her singing of two such varied numbers as those she chose furnished a unique exhibition of her art as a singer. It was agreeable to a greater extent than it usually is to observe that this art when expended on material so worthy as Mozart's seems more marvellous than ever. No arrangements for an encore had been made, but Mr. Gericke, after Mme. Sembrich had been recalled half a dozen times, was compelled to repeat the last part of the "Norma" aria.

Virtuosity was represented yesterday at the concert in a high estate. Mme. Sembrich's performance was remarkable enough and was followed by the achievements of the orchestra, which proved more than ever its right to be called a virtuoso orchestra. It played the Cherubini overture with the utmost finish and precision and made a delight what might have afforded under other circumstances less ground for enjoyment. The unfinished Schubert symphony was played in faultless fashion. The performance of Brahms's Hungarian dances yesterday possessed, in addition to the care and finish with which they were played, just the spirit their successful performance requires. Miss Leonora Jackson is to be the soloist at this evening's concert.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS

Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

THURSDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra in a Classical Programme—"Tannhauser" at the Opera—George Grossmith Once More.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, gave the first of its two February concerts at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, the second being scheduled for to-night. Mme. Sembrich was the soloist yesterday, and Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, will appear in that capacity this evening. Both programmes had been made with a remembrance of the ultra modern character of those offered here last month by this admirable organization, and except for Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," which is to be played to-night, for the second time in this city, neither list contains anything new or recent.

The orchestral works performed yesterday were Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon," opus 241, Schubert's Unfinished symphony and three of Brahms's Hungarian dances, scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow. In keeping with this scheme, Mme. Sembrich's numbers were the aria, "L'amero, saro Costante," from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma."

Mr. Gericke's reading of the Schubert symphony was thoroughly delightful. Its lovely melodies were sung with spirit and grace under his baton and the orchestra warmly seconded him. There was just the right strength and vigor in those stern and wondrously impressive minor chords that break in upon the idyllic atmosphere of the first movement, and the whole performance was one to cause enthusiasm. The same could be said of the playing of the Cherubini overture, so rarely heard nowadays. The calm classicism of this product of 1803 is relieved by a certain freshness and spontaneity that still exerts a charm. As for the Brahms dances, the first two played yesterday would bear more frequent repetition here. The third is rather commonplace.

Mme. Sembrich, whose voice seemed scarcely at its usual strength, sang with that same rare art that has made her famous. Mozart has no more sympathetic and winning interpreter in these days than this Polish soprano. Her performance of the aria from "Il Re Pastore" aroused the wish to hear it oftener and at the same time explained why this wish could not be fulfilled, unless Mme. Sembrich herself could always be at hand to sing it. None but an absolute mistress of art dares essay such a task. "Casta Diva," too, went with the same exquisite rhythmic and tonal charm, and the audience demanded a reptition of the finale.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEB. 22, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Fourth Matinee of This Season at Carnegie Hall.

The fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. There was a large audience, which went to some pains to make it clear that it was not there to hear the orchestra, but to pour out the plenitude of its worship at the feet of the soloist. This was one of the famous stars of the opera company, and wherever these stars go they draw after them a multitude of those emotional creatures whose lives are given over to the adoration of singers.

It is always a joy to hear Marcella Sembrich sing, but when she puts the Boston Symphony Orchestra into the background at one of its own concerts one cannot help feeling that she is accorded a too prominent position at that time. Yet it is no fault of hers that such is the case. It is the doing of the singer-worshippers in which this town abounds.

The programme yesterday afternoon consisted of Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, the aria "l'amero, saro Costante," from Mozart's "Il re Pastore," Schubert's unfinished symphony, the aria, "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma," and Brahms's Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2, and 6. Mme. Sembrich sang the two arias, and it may comfort many operagoers to know that she was in excellent voice, and sang with all her familiar spirit and her unfailing perfection of art. She repeated the cabaletta of the Bellini number in response to the prolonged demand for more. Although she sang it just as well the second time as she did the first, the applause which followed the repetition was almost inaudible. A repetition seemed not to be what the audience desired; it probably wished her to sing something more than she had agreed to sing.

The orchestra was in fine fettle yesterday. The weariness which ensues upon the night travel from Baltimore to this city was not to be discerned in the playing. The precision of the attack in the Cherubini overture was splendid, and the unanimity was such that the limpid clearness of the work was revealed in all its delightful perfection. As an example of the French classic style nothing is more admirable than this overture, and it sounded most refreshing yesterday.

Schubert's unfinished symphony has had a considerable rest. It has not been heard, if we mistake not, since it was performed under the direction of Mr. Seidl at the Astoria concerts. At any rate, it came with a sense of newness yesterday afternoon, and this was increased by the charming finish of the performance. The orchestra played the familiar measures with such mellow tone, such well-knit smoothness, and such undulatory nuancing that it was a presentation long to be remembered among the many which this composition has had in this city. The Brahms dances were the only part of the programme in which the work of the orchestra was not perfectly satisfactory, and there it did seem as if a little weariness had crept into the performance. All was clear and smooth, but there was a lack of dash and brilliancy. Mr. Gericke conducted all the music yesterday sympathetically.

New-York Daily Tribune.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The programme which Mr. Gericke provided yesterday for the fourth afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra betrayed a desire, which has been more or less noticeable all season, to popularize these entertainments, as the phrase goes. A solo performer was provided, who was bound to prove attractive to everybody—to the keenly appreciative lover of the highest style of vocalization no less than to the merest curiosity hunter tempted by newspaper comment and gossip—and the orchestral numbers were of the kind that neither look formidable on the programme nor ask a strain on the attention for any considerable space of time continuously. Symphonic music there had to be, of course, but Mr. Gericke took refuge in that loveliest of musical torsos, Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. This, the overture to "Anacreon," by Cherubini, and three Hungarian dances, arranged by Brahms and orchestrated by him and Albert Parlow, constituted the frame in which Mme. Sembrich and her exquisite art were displayed. A lovely frame it was, and perhaps as appropriate a one as could have been found under the circumstances, for Mme. Sembrich and her selections fitted into it perfectly. The adorable woman sang the aria with violin obligato (admirably played by Mr. Kneisel) from Mozart's "Il Re pastore," which she gave here earlier in the season at one of the Sunday evening concerts, and "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma." She sang in her finest manner, and evoked much enthusiasm, to which she was obliged to respond by a repetition at the last, in spite of Mr. Gericke's rule that such things must not be. She repeated the conclusion of the Bellini air.

The Evening Post.

New York, Thursday, Feb. 22, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mme. Sembrich was the soloist at yesterday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. An aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" (a little opera produced at Salzburg in 1775, when Mozart was only nineteen years of age), and Bellini's "Casta Diva" were her numbers, and she sang them with a luscious tone quality, and perfection of vocal art that were altogether admirable, evoking so much applause that Mr. Gericke was obliged to break the rule of the organization and permit a repetition of the last part of the scene from "Norma."

The orchestra itself has never been heard to better advantage. Even the Cherubini "Anacreon," with which time has not dealt kindly, was acceptable in such a polished classical performance. The two movements of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" were played most enchantingly, and one could not but marvel once more at the spontaneity and wealth of melody, the sensuous beauty of the orchestral coloring, and the novelty of the modulations in this great work—points in which Schubert excels Beethoven. The three best of Brahms's twenty-one Hungarian Dances, Nos, 1, 2, and 6, were subsequently played with much vivacity. At this evening's concert Miss Lenora Jackson will play the Mendelssohn violin concerto.

The Evening Sun.

'Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
THE EVENING SUN, per month................. .20
THE EVENING SUN, per year..................$2.00

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fourth matinée attracted a great audience to Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon and offered a programme decidedly out of the beaten path of Boston performances. The instrumental selections which were played yesterday were among the most graceful and captivating in all music of this sort, while the presence of Marcella Sembrich as soloist indicated the completeness of the management's new purpose in matinée musical entertainment.

If any listener was not pleased, he or she was quite lost in the tumult of applause that followed the singing of the "Casta Diva" from Bellini's "Norma." Mme. Sembrich was at her best yesterday and, after half a dozen recalls, Conductor Gericke was compelled to allow a partial repetition of this aria before the concert could proceed. The earlier aria, from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," had the help of Mr. Kneisel in violin obligato. Of the numbers for orchestra, the first on the programme was the overture of Cherubini's forgotten opera, "Anacreon," in which the brilliant passages for the violins gave fine opportunity for a display of virtuosity. The lovely "Unfinished Symphony" of Schubert and three Hungarian dances, adapted by Brahms and scored for orchestra by that composer and Albert Parlow, completed the musical offering. There was nothing to ruffle the serenity of the most indolent of music-lovers, while at the same time the technical listener found abundant musical delight. Altogether it was an ideal matinée and one that perhaps no other orchestra and no other soloist could have excelled. There will be sterner stuff, musically speaking, in the fourth evening concert to-night, when one new work will be brought forward and the soloist will be Leonora Jackson.

Evening Telegram.

HIGH WATER MARK
Circulation...... 330,900

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, [illegible]

Fully recovered from her indisposition Mme. Sembrich distinguished herself last night as the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, where she sang an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" and the "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma."

She gave these numbers with her usual faultless technique, at the same time imbuing the "Casta Diva" with its full dramatic significance. The applause which followed her singing was so prolonged that she would have been justified in giving encores for both numbers, but she contented herself with singing again only after the Bellini selection.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Sembrich was the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon. She sang an aria from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore," and the "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma."

She gave these numbers with her usual faultless technique, at the same time imbuing the "Casta Diva" with its full dramatic significance. The applause which followed her singing was so prolonged that she would have been justified in giving encores for both numbers, but she contented herself with singing again only after the Bellini selection.

The most brilliant performances on the part of the orchestra were the three Hungarian dances by Brahms which brought the concert to a close. They were played in dashing style, with technical perfection and with true Magyar verve. For beauty of tone the second movement of Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" was prominent, while Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" was given with rugged strength.

The World.

hed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PAR
New York.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1900.

SEMBRICH IN CONCERT.

For once the master orchestra from Boston, conducted by Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, took second place at one of its concerts. The occasion was the fourth matinee, given at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Mme. Sembrich was the soloist, and as such overshadowed the instrumental achievements called for by the programme. Mr. Gericke must have foreseen this, for his offerings were scant in quantity, and, while agreeable in quality, possessed ordinary interest only. As it was, the concert, including two vocal numbers and an encore, lasted less than an hour and a half. Concerts as a rule are too long, but the visits of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are so few and far apart that a two hours' function with more substantial matter would be more acceptable.

There were three orchestral selections—Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, and three of the twenty-one Hungarian dances in which Brahms in his lighter moods expressed his enthusiastic admiration for the national Magyar melodies.

The orchestra played superbly. In the Cherubini opus the violins negotiated the brilliant passages alloted to them with extraordinary virtuosity. The symphony, sympathetically read by Mr. Gericke, was interpreted with abeautiful tone, extreme suavity and finish. The second movement—the occurring clarinet solo of which was finely played—illustrated in eloquent manner the superlative qualities of this great orchestra.

In the Hungarian dances the characteristic spirit of the composition was fascinatingly expressed. The two oboists covered themselves with glory in the dainty theme which forms the backbone of the second dance.

Mme. Sembrich has never been in better or fresher voice and has never displayed to a fuller extent the virtues of her art. She sang a Mozart aria from "Il Re Pastore," with the violin obligato artistically played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, and "Casta Diva" from Bellini's "Norma." Her perfections in tone production, phrasing, expression and execution were so completely revealed that they made a mockery of much of the singing that is heard during the season.

At to-night's concert the orchestra will play Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides" and Beethoven's eighth symphony, and Miss Leonora Jackson, the violinist, will be the soloist.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
THE EVENING SUN, per month..................
THE EVENING SUN, per year..................$2.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1900.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded its fourth evening concert of the present season at Carnegie Hall last evening with Beethoven's Symphony No. 8, that "lesser symphony in F" whose daring novelty of style was actually received with cold disfavor by the Viennese audience of 1814, the year of its production. The "modernness" of the work was not apparent last evening, for it followed Berlioz's "King Lear" overture and Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides." After the studied effects of the older French composer and the airy nothings to which Franck gave a symphonic name, Beethoven's lightest symphony had a fine and substantial nobility of manner and material that made it the more welcome. It should be needless to add that the orchestra under Mr. Gericke's direction brought out with surpassing clearness the cheerfulness and humor that mark this work. It was a delightful return to a familiar field after a season of many novelties and much devotion to soloists with great names. Franck's "Les Eolides," which was first played here by Theodore Thomas two years ago, is a lovely, sighing thing, as aimless as the "floating breezes" of Leconte de Lisle, which it pictures. It is not a work to be frequently heard, but the elaborate development of its single theme made it an interesting display piece for Boston's virtuoso orchestra.

Leonora Jackson, the soloist of last evening, played Mendelssohn's violin concerto with really good effect. Persistent recalls by the audience indicated the usual willingness to "spoil" any talented performer with youth and simplicity of manner in her favor. Miss Jackson's playing, however, was agreeably characterized by strong, pure tone and free bowing, while it was marred by a nervousness in accentuation which she will find it necessary, and perhaps possible, to overcome. There is some excuse for a sophisticated audience when it applauds a young woman in a plain muslin frock who has succeeded in pleasing it. There would be no excuse for a musician, whatever his or her age, who became less of a learner in the art because of popularity early acquired.

NEW YORK HERALD,

FEBRUARY 23, 1900.—S

THE BOSTON SYMPHONISTS.

Notwithstanding the counter attraction of the Wagner cycle at the Metropolitan Opera House, the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, at Carnegie Hall last night, was fairly well attended. The soloist was Miss Leonora Jackson, violiniste, whose accomplished art has already won her a welcome here. She played the Mendelssohn concerto in a masterly style, revealing a delicious tone in the beautiful andante and almost virile power in the brilliant finale. The symphony of the evening was Beethoven's Eighth, which was performed as few besides the Boston band can play it. The other numbers were Berlioz' "Overture to King Lear" and César Frank's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," a distinctly modern work, original both in its material and treatment.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its present visit to New-York was given last evening in Carnegie Hall, and attracted the close attention and evident admiration of a large audience. The orchestra played in its finest form, and that, its friends in New-York know, is an unceasing joy. It could have expended its powers, however, on a programme of greater interest. Berlioz's overture to "King Lear" and César Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides"—the latter of which was not played for the "first time" here, as the compiler of the programme would have it—are both grateful to an orchestra of virtuosos and its conductor, but scarcely so to those who desire to hear in orchestral compositions something more than rich and varied color and brilliant playing. And even as to its orchestration the Berlioz overture no longer impresses the modern hearer very deeply—not enough to conceal from him the exceedingly commonplace character of its musical structure, which, as is the case with most of Berlioz's other compositions, is becoming more and more evident in these latter days. César Franck in his "Eolides" had a much less ambitious purpose in view than Berlioz, that did not include any dramatic exposition of the poem of Leconte de Lisle cited in the programme as the immediate inspiration of the work. Its themes are fragmentary and it leaves little more than an impression of color expressed in mystic and sensuous harmony, heightened in its effect by the richness of the orchestration. The splendid vigor and energy with which Beethoven's Eighth Symphony was played were as a draught of fresh air after these things.

Miss Leonora Jackson was the solo performer. She made a somewhat better impression than she did at her first appearance some weeks ago in Brahms's violin concerto, chiefly because Mendelssohn's is much nearer the level of her capacities, but she still failed to show herself an artist of power or individuality. She played fluently and in general with accuracy, but her tone lacks charm and her point of view was one of immature sentimentality. This did not prevent an extremely friendly audience from applauding her with much vigor and insisting on her frequent reappearance upon the platform.

The New-York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, FEB. 23, 1900.

Fourth Evening Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Die Walkuere" at the Metropolitan Opera House Without Cuts—A New Musical Farce.

The fourth evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The audience was precisely what one would have expected from the presence of Leonora Jackson as the solo performer. This young and immature violinist has such a strong social backing that a large and well-garbed audience was a foregone conclusion. It was also inevitable that she would be called out many times and that a determined effort would be made to secure an encore, in spite of Mr. Gericke's iron rule in regard to this matter. Cato, however, did not relax the least bit, and there was no encore number. If Miss Jackson's influential friends do not succeed in utterly destroying her, she may some day be a good violinist of the classic school. But the influences behind her are so unfailingly pernicious in all that pertains to musical art that grave fears for her future may be reasonably entertained.

She played last night the Mendelssohn concerto, which music-lovers would naturally expect to find far more nearly within her grasp than that of Brahms, essayed by her at her first appearance here. She certainly showed a clearer conception of the nature of the composition, and she played with the same assurance as before. But the performance was in most of its traits crude and amateurish. Rhythms were distorted and accentuation applied in the most injudicious manner. The young lady's tone was rough and without mellowness. The best that can be said of the performance is that the bowing was admirably free and the intonation generally correct. The most fortunate thing that could happen to Miss Jackson would be the receipt of an invitation to spend a few more years under a wise and sympathetic master. But unless there is latent somewhere in her composition a fire of temperament which has not yet blazed to the surface, greatness is far away from her.

The orchestral numbers last night were Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, César Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Beethoven's eighth symphony. It is unnecessary to enter into detailed comment on Mr. Gericke's interpretation or the orchestra's performance of the first and third of these works. Conductor and men were deserving of only warm praise. The Franck work was through some misinformation announced as for the first time, but it was played here two years ago by the Chicago Orchestra, under Theodore Thomas. It may be said at this time, however, that the work did not clamor for repetition. The thematic material is of the highest possible texture and the working out consists of some nicely devised harmonic changes and orchestral coloring. But the composition as a whole is weak and invertebrate. It has no especial reason for existence. It was played with charming clearness and balance of tone.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Leonora Jackson, the Violinist, Received With Enthusiasm.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its concert in Carnegie Hall last night, played Cesar Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides," given by Theodore Thomas two years ago for the first time here; Beethoven's eighth symphony and Berlotz's "King Lear" overture. Leonora Jackson was heard as the soloist in Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Franch's composition was suggested by four lines in Leconte de l' Isle's poem which give the title to the work. A chromatic theme is frequently repeated and reappears in slightly varied forms. It is a poetic and delicate work, ingeniously orchestrated, interesting and novel in execution, if somewhat monotonous and not striking in other ways. It was played with the greatest delicacy and finish by the orchestra which could have been expected to perform perfectly a number demanding the treatment necessary for a work of this character.

Miss Jackson attempted last night no such serious task as she did on her first appearance here when she selected the Brahms violin concerto. In the Mendelssohn number she found a better medium for the display of her present attainments. The results of her careful study and training, her technical merits and her natural talent were displayed to excellent advantage. It would be wrong to say that her full development has yet been reached, but she is a violinist of significant achievement. The audience applauded her with great enthusiasm.

The Beethoven Symphony and Berlioz's overture were played by the orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke with the customary excellence that is associated with all its performance.

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, February 23, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Leonora Jackson, who has, during the last month or two, played with most of the leading musical organizations in this country, and been received with favor everywhere, made her second appearance in New York last night at the evening concert of the Boston Orchestra. She chose for this occasion the Mendelssohn concerto, which is not only better suited to her years and her style than the empty and austere Brahms concerto, but is better music and more felicitously adapted to the nature of the violin. It has been played here by the world's greatest artists with a more seething tone, more variety and expression; but it would obviously be unfair to measure a young girl of twenty by the standard of Wilhelmj and Ysaye. Her playing at present evinces not only good training, skill, and ease, but it is characterized by a girlish sweetness which makes a pleasant impression, especially in such music as Mendelssohn's. The large audience was immensely delighted with her playing, and at the end called her out more than half-a-dozen times, but, unlike Mme. Sembrich, she submitted to the rules of the organization, and refused an encore.

In the making of his programme Mr. Gericke did not distinguish himself; he seems to reserve his worst programmes for New York. Beethoven's eighth symphony has been played here so often that everybody is tired of it. César Franck's "Eolides" is a bit of impressionism lacking both in ideas and in form; and as for Berlioz, why is it that the Boston musicians will persist in forcing such shallow, empty, pompous stuff on us as the "Lear" overture? The scant applause showed that nobody wanted to hear it. If the Boston Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall are not always as well attended as they might be, the wretched programmes are largely to blame.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The
Commercial Advertiser Association.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 23, 1900.

The second Boston Symphony concert of the present series, given in the Carnegie Hall last night, was much more satisfactory than the first, because the programme was much more interesting. It comprised Berlioz's King Lear overture, Franck's symphonic poem, Les Eolides, and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The soloist was Miss Leonora Jackson, who played the Mendelssohn concerto. To tell the truth, the Berlioz overture is not one of the most interesting works even of that composer, who, with all his undoubted skill as a writer, was as a rule lamentably deficient in subjects. He has written some entrancing music, but more that is downright stupid, and the King Lear overture is not far removed from the latter class. One cannot deny that he makes the most of his material, but his material is so dull that one rather loses interest in the workmanship. Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, however, seems to improve on acquaintance. When Thomas played it here two years ago the general impression left by it was one of aimlessness. It seemed to begin nowhere in particular and to end in much the same fashion. A second hearing, however, was sufficient to change that impression greatly. It is not a great work and cannot compare in the least with his symphony heard here a few weeks ago, but it is delicately poetic in conception and working-out, and, played as it was by the Boston men, it made a most attractive number. The symphony was, as might have been expected, beautifully done by Mr. Gericke and his men.

Miss Jackson had much more congenial material in the Mendelssohn concerto than she had in the Brahms, which she chose to introduce herself by when she returned to this country, and the results were better in every way She played it very prettily and well within established tradition. It is hard for any violinist to give any new twist to this veteran, and Miss Jackson happily did not attempt any such feat. One could have asked for a mellower and sweeter tone from her instrument and more elasticity in her playing; but, on the whole, it was a meritorious performance, deserving of praise.

The [illegible] Press

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 19

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fraulein Ternina the Soloist—Schubert's B Minor Symphony Read.

The spell of the Nibelungen lied was over the concert, but whatever of tragedy lurked in the closing scene of "Die Gotterdammerung," so sympathetically interpreted by Fraulein Ternina, had been previously exorcised by the lovely melodies and heavenly harmonies of Schubert's symphony in B minor, unfinished. This gave the fourth Monday evening concert of the Boston symphony orchestra at the Academy of Music a touch of sheer classical romanticism, for that is what Schubert's glorious two movements are that proved a delicious boon, for the last scene from Wagner's great tetralogy when heard without the background and the human mise en scene is more a matter of musical mnemonics than a real gratification for itself and in itself. Splendidly read as it was by the orchestra and with the vocal score in the hands of a great artist, it recalled a thrilling conclusive en scene rather than led up to one in all actuality. The symphony calls for no collocation of all the arts to make its appeal, and Mr. Gericke gave its fine rhythmic pulse, and its tonal beauties outlined in the immortal melodies of the allegro and andante, both from Arcadia and enriched with the harmonic resolutions, in a way that was the perfection of interpretation and put every hearer under special obligation.

Wagner and Schubert were not the only attractive features of what was a rarely excellent program, as Moszkowski's suite in F major, four movements of which were given, was admirably done. There are occasions of frivolity in the suite, and it is structurally uneven, almost to weakness at certain moments, but in the hands of a virtuoso orchestra such as the Boston Symphony it stands out with glowing effect in the rendering. Each movement has a special interest, the first insistently spirited, the second liveliness itself, the third the inevitable theme with variations having a cadenza for the flute that pleases even if it seems unnecessary, while the last, with its "perpetual motion," giving the strings a chance, winds up the suite in a way that few orchestras can render so brilliantly as that which acts as one man under Mr. Gericke's baton.

Fraulein Ternina was heard also in the recitative and aria "Komm Hoffnung," frim "Fidelio." Here, as in the Wagner music, there was continual evidence in the change from one register to another, and in certain mezzo-voce effects, that the great singer is not altogether herself. The dramatic expression, the depth of feeling with which Fraulein Ternina sings are, however, of the highest order, and when at her vocal best is art truly satisfying. On Saturday night Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 will be given with Berlioz's "King Lear" overture, Mendelssohn's violin concerto, Miss Leonora Jackson, soloist, and the introduction to and some of the music of the third act of "Die Meistersinger."

The World.

ed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PAR
New York.

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 1900.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Short but Interesting Concert, with Leonora Jackson as Soloist.

Mr. Gericke is evidently bent on short programmes. The one of last night's concert by the Boston Orchestra was but little longer than that of Wednesday afternoon. Still, if short, it was nevertheless interesting.

The audience was large enough to fill Carnegie Hall. The soloist was Leonora Jackson, and judging by the insistent applause which followed her solo, her patronesses must all have been present. At her first appearance with the Philharmonic Miss Jackson played Brahms's concerto; last night she was heard in Mendelssohn's. A good estimate of her capabilities may be formed from the comparison of the two performances. She was unequal to the task of interpreting Brahms, but she gave a musical reading of the Mendelssohn opus. Aside from a tendency to sentimentalize unduly the melodious cantilena of the second movement and, in fact, all other melodic passages, she played well, if superficially.

The North American
Daily Advertiser

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Excellent Programme Rendered, With Ternina as Soloist.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Ternina, gave the first concert of the first series for this season at the Academy of Music last evening. The audience was large and composed principally of the sincere devotees of music which the symphony concerts drew together. Frl. Ternina has never sung in better voice, nor has the orchestra ever rendered an excellent programme with more pleasing effect. Mr. William Gericke conducted:

Moritz Moszkowski. Four Movements from Suite No. 1, in F major, Op. 39.
  I. Allegro molto e brioso (F major).
  II. Allegretto giojoso (D minor).
  III. Tema con Variazioni: Andante (A major).
  V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace (F major).
Ludwig van Beethoven—Recitative, "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and Aria, "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio," Act I., No. 9.
Franz Schubert—Unfinished Symphony in B minor
  I. Allegro moderato (B minor).
  II. Andante con moto (E major).
Richard Wagner,
  Closing Scene from "Die Gotterdammerung."

CUT-OUT

INCOMPLETE

The orchestra was also heard to great advantage in the Schubert symphony, whose entrancing strains could not have been more sympathetically or impressively interpreted.

Mme. Ternina was the soloist and was heard in the Invocation to Hope, from Fidelio, and the finale of the Gotterdammerung. In both selections she made an ample and convincing demonstration of the powers which have placed her in the front rank of the lyric singers of the day. She sings with a beauty of tone, a dignity of manner and an elevation of spirit which impart to her performance the stamp of greatness. Although she is essentially a dramatic artist, her singing last night did not seem to lose much of its value or significance from the absence of a dramatic environment. Both the Leonora and the Brunnhilde scenes were magnificently delivered and if there was some trace of weariness at the last the circumstance was not surprising in view of Mme. Ternina's unfortunate experience with the wonderful American climate.

There will be another concert on Saturday evening next, when Miss Leonora Kackson will be the soloist and the program will include Berlioz's King Lear overture, some selections from "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's eighth symphony, the "Little One" and Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Feb. 20, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Crowded houses and Boston Symphony concerts are now synonymous terms, and Fraulein Milka Ternina's appearance last night as soloist added to the attractiveness of the evening for the public.

The opening number of Suite No. 1 in F major, four movements in Moritz Moszkowski, was specially fine in the allegretto movement. Its dainty pizzicato style and running movements showed the wonderfulfy sympathetic orchestra in its best harmony. Many of the passages remind one of Grieg. In the third movement the flute solo was so heartily applauded by the audience that Mr. Gericke perforce made a pause after the third variation.

Franz Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor is both exquisite and pathetic. In the second movement the effect sounded of organ pipes, the result of perfect unison in bass and wind instruments on bass clef.

Fraulein Ternina appeared both as Leonore and Brunnhilde. Her recitative and invocation from "Fidelio," whilst pure and clear in tone, rather lacked warmth and fervor, but the orchestral accompaniment left nothing to be desired. The mellowness of her beautiful voice was heard to much greater advantage in Brunnhilde's lament over Seigfried, although on several occasions the higher notes showed strain, either from severe weather or recent illness. She was vociferously applauded.

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 20, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Ternina and a Novelty as Part of a Beautiful Musical Evening.

That clever piano pedagogue, Moszkowski, had one of his best orchestral compositions presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night as the first number in the fourth concert of its first series at the Academy of Music.

The third and fifth movements of the suite No. 1 in F major, the title by which it is known, formed part of a programme under Nikisch in April, 1893, so that the other two movements on last night's programme were novelties the first and second.

They were also the most enjoyable. The allegretto, or second movement, is particularly graceful and its development reaches a collision of themes just at its finale that provides a sensation of peculiar satisfaction.

The orchestra played this number with delightful buoyancy and the variations in the third movement, bringing into requisition as they did, frequent examples of solo work by the different departments, allowed the audience to form a better idea of the individual virtuoso ability in its ranks, and, in the case of the variations allotted to the flute, afforded an illustration of the most perfect tone and facile scale ever heard upon that instrument within present memory.

Wilhelm Gericke was in another of his most liberal moods, and as in the case of the Strauss number at the concerts last month, so again throughout the programme last evening he inclined more to broad and stirring musical effect than to the conservative rule of three, and therefore conducted one of the most complete musical treats which these concerts have provided for the public. More than this may not be said.

The Schubert unfinished symphony came in for its due share of delicate appreciation. All its delicious nuances and themes were persuasively given and its climaxes were splendidly broadened. It served possibly better than any other composition could to lead the mind to an appreciable frame for the closing scene in Gotterdammerung, wherein the orchestra was aided by Milka Ternina.

It was, however, in the grand recitative and aria from Beethoven's Fidelio that this artist was heard at her best. The lustre of her superb voice in this music was as the resplendent glow of a royal velvet and the music was literally clothed in its great dignity. A complete absence of that gracious patronage with which lesser artists insult their audience is apparent in Ternina's presence and deportment, and the repose of her delivery stands as a unique example of what greatness in vocal art may achieve without a resort to the traditional prima donna smirks and graces which too frequently are in evidence.

The programme for Saturday evening announces Beethoven's eighth symphony and Leonora Jackson as soloist in a Mendelssohn concerto.

HE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, TUESDAY FEBRUARY 20, 1900

Fourth Regular Boston Symphony Concert.

It is doubtful whether the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever appeared to better advantage than in last evening's performance of Moszkowski's first Suite, which was the opening number of the fourth Monday concert of the season of that famous organization. The Suite is composed of five movements, four of which were played last night (the fourth being omitted). The first and second are in the form of a symphonic scherzo; the third is a theme with variations, and the fifth a perpetuum mobile. The two last movements created the deepest impression, the fourth variation—a brilliant flute solo—eliciting a storm of applause which could not be suppressed until the flutist arose and bowed his thanks; an interruption most unusual in a Symphony concert. Another admirable performance was the Seventh Variation, for strings pizzicati. It is almost needless to say that the perpetuum mobile was a marvelous exhibition of orchestral playing. Both Mr. Gericke, the indefatigable conductor, and the entire orchestra are to be warmly congratulated upon the rendition of this Suite. The other orchestral number of the concert was Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," the performance of which by this unrivaled organization is too well known to call for further comment. The soloist was Fraulein Milka Ternina, who was heard in Leonora's "Hope" aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and also in the final scene from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung." The Beethoven aria was sung most artistically, but in the Wagner selection the Munich soprano did not by any means efface the memory of the Bruennhilde of Nordica last week. The orchestral accompaniments of both selections were excellent. For the concert on Saturday evening by the same organization the soloist announced is Miss Leonora Jackson, who will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1900.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE fourth pair of concerts of this season's series were given at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Wilhelm Gericke. Here is the program of the matinee:

Overture to Anacreon, op. 241	Cherubini
Aria, L'amero, saro Costante, from Il Re Pastore	Mozart
Unfinished Symphony in B minor	Schubert
Casta Diva, from Norma	Bellini
Three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6	Brahms

(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow.)

I. Allegro molto (G minor), 2-4.
II. Allegretto (F major), 2-4.
VI. Vivace (D major), 2-4.

It is always a pleasure, in these days of ranting musical rhetoric, to listen to Cherubini. Two of his works are classic masterpieces; the "Anacreon" and the "Water Carriers" overtures. To be sure, there is little of what modern writers would consider anacreontic or bacchanalian in the first named, for its lines are quite precise, its pattern organized beyond the doubt of improvisation. Needless to say that the composer's scheme was not deranged by Mr. Gericke, who also read Schubert's lovely symphony with delicate dynamic discrimination. This music sounds as fresh as the day it was conceived. The Brahms dances were given with due dash and passionate precision.

Although much ado had been made over the appearance at this concert of Marcella Sembrich, the audience that gathered was hardly large enough to warrant one in believing the singer attracted it. She sang with her usual finish and classical tonal balance, except the Mozart Aria, and for encore repeated the cabaletto in the Bellini aria.

Thursday evening the music presented was this:

Overture to King Lear, in C major, op. 4	Berlioz
Concerto for violin, in E minor, op. 64	Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Les Eolides	Franck
Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93	Beethoven

Miss Leonora Jackson played the Mendelssohn concerto with polish, intellectual poise and musical depth. The work seems grateful to her talents, and she delivered its three movements in a charming fashion. The andante gave her excellent schooling and feeling and for broad cantabile abundant opportunity. The scherzo was deftly interpreted. Miss Jackson was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and she was recalled, but as there is a strict and sensible rule regarding encores, the gifted young artist did not play again.

The Berlioz overture, one of the most spontaneous of its creator's, was read with sympathy, nor can fault be found with Mr. Gericke's interpretation of the ever welcome F major symphony of the master of masters. The allegretto and menuetto were taken at the traditional tempi. The work of the string choir throughout was beyond praise. César Franck's "Les Eolides" was first played in this city by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra several seasons ago. It is purely a virtuoso piece, not profoundly imaginative, and in a single movement. The composer's refined skill in instrumentation is everywhere discernible, the prevailing tints being suggestively airy. Though Mr. Apthorp gives Leconte de Lisle's poem as a sort of program, there is little in the score that companions the French poet's pictures. But the piece gave admirable scope for the brilliant executive powers of this organization. The fifth and last group of concerts will take place March 21 and 22.

The orchestra played in Brooklyn on Friday night, with Leonora Jackson as soloist. The Haydn Symphony in G major and the Moszkowski Suite in F major were presented, and Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto.

PHILADELPHIA OFFICE THE MUSICA COURIER,
4230 Regent Squar, February 24, 1900.

WITH the exception of the Boston Symphony nothing has been heard this week of great importance, and I have been enjoying a calm which has not even been disturbed by lurid accounts of a Damoclean sword, which, acording to hearsay, is hanging over my heretofore unsuspecting head.

It appears that someone in town, unfortunately forgetting that I mentioned no names in my first letter, has been trying on the shoe, and finding that it pinches, most uncomfortably, has circulated what they fondly hoped would be an awe-inspiring, soul-terrifying report that it would be the same person's pleasant duty to arrest me! Shades of my illustrious grandfathers arise and defend me! I thought this bit of news was too good to selfishly keep to myself.

But to come back to things of a more intelligent if less exciting nature. The Boston Symphony on Monday night was, needless to say, orchestrally, very good. The Moszkowski Suite, No. 1, in F. major, and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony filling that part of the program. The soloist was Ternina, who sang both the "Fidelio" number and the closing scene from the "Götterdämmerung" in a way that left much to be desired. Her final notes in the "Götterdämmerung" were not notes at all, they were shrieks.

The Manuscript Music Society held their fourth meeting of the season Wednesday evening February 21. The pro-

[76]

CUT-OUT

PHILADELPHIA, FEBRUARY 20, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Ternina and a Novelty as Part of a Beautiful Musical Evening.

That clever piano pedagogue, Moszkowski, had one of his best orchestral compositions presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night as the first number in the fourth concert of its first series at the Academy of Music.

The third and fifth movements of the suite No. 1 in F major, the title by which it is known, formed part of a programme under Nikisch in April, 1893, so that the other two movements on last night's programme were novelties the first and second.

They were also the most enjoyable. The allegretto, or second movement, is particularly graceful and its development reaches a collision of themes just at its finale that provides a sensation of peculiar satisfaction.

The orchestra played this number with delightful buoyancy and the variations in the third movement, bringing into requisition as they did, frequent examples of solo work by the different departments, allowed the audience to form a better idea of the individual virtuoso ability in its ranks, and, in the case of the variations allotted to the flute, afforded an illustration of the most perfect tone and facile scale ever heard upon that instrument within present memory.

Wilhelm Gericke was in another of his most liberal moods, and as in the case of the Strauss number at the concerts last month, so again throughout the programme last evening he inclined more to broad and stirring musical effect than to the conservative rule of three, and therefore conducted one of the most complete musical treats which these concerts have provided for the public. More than this may not be said.

The Schubert unfinished symphony came in for its due share of delicate appreciation. All its delicious nuances and themes were persuasively given and its climaxes were splendidly broadened. It served possibly better than any other composition could to lead the mind to an appreciable frame for the closing scene in Gotterdammerung, wherein the orchestra was aided by Milka Ternina.

It was, however, in the grand recitative and aria from Beethoven's Fidelio that this artist was heard at her best. The lustre of her superb voice in this music was as the resplendent glow of a royal velvet and the music was literally clothed in its great dignity. A complete absence of that gracious patronage with which lesser artists insult their audience is apparent in Ternina's presence and deportment, and the repose of her delivery stands as a unique example of what greatness in vocal art may achieve without a resort to the traditional prima donna smirks and graces which too frequently are in evidence.

The programme for Saturday evening announces Beethoven's eighth symphony and Leonora Jackson as soloist in a Mendelssohn concerto.

INCOMPLETE

The orchestra was also heard to great advantage in the Schubert symphony, whose entrancing strains could not have been more sympathetically or impressively interpreted.

Mme. Ternina was the soloist and was heard in the Invocation to Hope, from Fidelio, and the finale of the Gotterdammerung. In both selections she made an ample and convincing demonstration of the powers which have placed her in the front rank of the lyric singers of the day. She sings with a beauty of tone, a dignity of manner and an elevation of spirit which impart to her performance the stamp of greatness. Although she is essentially a dramatic artist, her singing last night did not seem to lose much of its value or significance from the absence of a dramatic environment. Both the Leonora and the Brunnhilde scenes were magnificently delivered and if there was some trace of weariness at the last the circumstance was not surprising in view of Mme. Ternina's unfortunate experience with the wonderful American climate.

There will be another concert on Saturday evening next, when Miss Leonora Kackson will be the soloist and the program will include Berlioz's King Lear overture, some selections from "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's eighth symphony, the "Little One" and Mendelssohn's concerto for the violin.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, Feb. 20, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Crowded houses and Boston Symphony concerts are now synonymous terms, and Fraulein Milka Ternina's appearance last night as soloist added to the attractiveness of the evening for the public.

The opening number of Suite No. 1 in F major, four movements in Moritz Moszkowski, was specially fine in the allegretto movement. Its dainty pizzicato style and running movements showed the wonderfully sympathetic orchestra in its best harmony. Many of the passages remind one of Grieg. In the third movement the flute solo was so heartily applauded by the audience that Mr. Gericke perforce made a pause after the third variation.

Franz Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor is both exquisite and pathetic. In the second movement the effect sounded of organ pipes, the result of perfect unison in bass and wind instruments on bass clef.

Fraulein Ternina appeared both as Leonore and Brunnhilde. Her recitative and invocation from "Fidelio," whilst pure and clear in tone, rather lacked warmth and fervor, but the orchestral accompaniment left nothing to be desired. The mellowness of her beautiful voice was heard to much greater advantage in Brunnhilde's lament over Seigfried, although on several occasions the higher notes showed strain, either from severe weather or recent illness. She was vociferously applauded.

HE PHILADELPHIA RECORD, TUESDAY FEBRUARY 20, 1900

Fourth Regular Boston Symphony Concert.

It is doubtful whether the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever appeared to better advantage than in last evening's performance of Moszkowski's first Suite, which was the opening number of the fourth Monday concert of the season of that famous organization. The Suite is composed of five movements, four of which were played last night (the fourth being omitted). The first and second are in the form of a symphonic scherzo; the third is a theme with variations, and the fifth a perpetuum mobile. The two last movements created the deepest impression, the fourth variation—a brilliant flute solo—eliciting a storm of applause which could not be suppressed until the flutist arose and bowed his thanks; an interruption most unusual in a Symphony concert. Another admirable performance was the Seventh Variation, for strings pizzicati. It is almost needless to say that the perpetuum mobile was a marvelous exhibition of orchestral playing. Both Mr. Gericke, the indefatigable conductor, and the entire orchestra are to be warmly congratulated upon the rendition of this Suite. The other orchestral number of the concert was Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," the performance of which by this unrivaled organization is too well known to call for further comment. The soloist was Fraulein Milka Ternina, who was heard in Leonora's "Hope" aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and also in the final scene from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung." The Beethoven aria was sung most artistically, but in the Wagner selection the Munich soprano did not by any means efface the memory of the Bruenhilde of Nordica last week. The orchestral accompaniments of both selections were excellent. For the concert on Saturday evening by the same organization the soloist announced is Miss Leonora Jackson, who will play Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1900.

Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE fourth pair of concerts of this season's series were given at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was conducted by Wilhelm Gericke. Here is the program of the matinee:

Overture to Anacreon, op. 241................................Cherubini
Aria, L'amero, saro Costante, from Il Re Pastore..............Mozart
Unfinished Symphony in B minor...............................Schubert
Casta Diva, from Norma...Bellini
Three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.......................Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow.)
I. Allegro molto (G minor), 2-4.
II. Allegretto (F major), 2-4.
VI. Vivace (D major), 2-4.

It is always a pleasure, in these days of ranting musical rhetoric, to listen to Cherubini. Two of his works are classic masterpieces; the "Anacreon" and the "Water Carriers" overtures. To be sure, there is little of what modern writers would consider anacreontic or bacchanalian in the first named, for its lines are quite precise, its pattern organized beyond the doubt of improvisation. Needless to say that the composer's scheme was not deranged by Mr. Gericke, who also read Schubert's lovely symphony with delicate dynamic discrimination. This music sounds as fresh as the day it was conceived. The Brahms dances were given with due dash and passionate precision.

Although much ado had been made over the appearance at this concert of Marcella Sembrich, the audience that gathered was hardly large enough to warrant one in believing the singer attracted it. She sang with her usual finish and classical tonal balance, except the Mozart Aria, and for encore repeated the cabaletto in the Bellini aria.

Thursday evening the music presented was this:

Overture to King Lear, in C major, op. 4.......................Berlioz
Concerto for violin, in E minor, op. 64........Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
Les Eolides..Franck
Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93.........................Beethoven

Miss Leonora Jackson played the Mendelssohn concerto with polish, intellectual poise and musical depth. The work seems grateful to her talents, and she delivered its three movements in a charming fashion. The andante gave her excellent schooling and feeling and for broad cantabile abundant opportunity. The scherzo was deftly interpreted. Miss Jackson was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and she was recalled, but as there is a strict and sensible rule regarding encores, the gifted young artist did not play again.

The Berlioz overture, one of the most spontaneous of its creator's, was read with sympathy, nor can fault be found with Mr. Gericke's interpretation of the ever welcome F major symphony of the master of masters. The allegretto and menuetto were taken at the traditional tempi. The work of the string choir throughout was beyond praise. César Franck's "Les Eolides" was first played in this city by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra several seasons ago. It is purely a virtuoso piece, not profoundly imaginative, and in a single movement. The composer's refined skill in instrumentation is everywhere discernible, the prevailing tints being suggestively airy. Though Mr. Apthorp gives Leconte de Lisle's poem as a sort of program, there is little in the score that companions the French poet's pictures. But the piece gave admirable scope for the brilliant executive powers of this organization. The fifth and last group of concerts will take place March 21 and 22.

The orchestra played in Brooklyn on Friday night, with Leonora Jackson as soloist. The Haydn Symphony in G major and the Moszkowski Suite in F major were presented, and Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto.

PHILADELPHIA OFFICE THE MUSICA COURIER,
1230 Regent Squa, February 24, 1900.

WITH the exception of the Boston Symphony nothing has been heard this week of great importance, and I have been enjoying a calm which has not even been disturbed by lurid accounts of a Damoclean sword, which, acording to hearsay, is hanging over my heretofore unsuspecting head.

It appears that someone in town, unfortunately forgetting that I mentioned no names in my first letter, has been trying on the shoe, and finding that it pinches, most uncomfortably, has circulated what they fondly hoped would be an awe-inspiring, soul-terrifying report that it would be the same person's pleasant duty to arrest me! Shades of my illustrious grandfathers arise and defend me! I thought this bit of news was too good to selfishly keep to myself.

But to come back to things of a more intelligent if less exciting nature. The Boston Symphony on Monday night was, needless to say, orchestrally, very good. The Moszkowski Suite, No. 1, in F. major, and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony filling that part of the program. The soloist was Ternina, who sang both the "Fidelio" number and the closing scene from the "Götterdämmerung" in a way that left much to be desired. Her final notes in the "Götterdämmerung" were not notes at all, they were shrieks.

The Manuscript Music Society held their fourth meeting of the season Wednesday evening February 21. The pro-

MUSIC HALL CLOSED IN

Boston's New Amusement Temple a Busy Place.

Builders Say It Will Be Completed About June 1.

How the Great Structure Looks Inside and Out.

The new Music Hall building, on the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, is a busy place these days, and now that the walls have been practically all closed in the great edifice begins to look like something. The sound of the hammer is heard on every hand, from cellar to ceiling; the man with the trowel is in the corridors setting in bricks and tiling, while at short intervals is heard the jingle of the elevator bell signals from the man on high to the man below to hurry along the loads of mortar from the basement. The dummy engine itself contributes to the noise with its hysterical snorting.

Sounds like these are in symphony, if they are not in harmony; and, while it might not do to say that the building is already a "music hall," there is certainly merry music to be heard there the day long. Two hundred men are variously engaged, and in two weeks more a lot of newcomers will be at work, the army of plasterers.

The building will be completed, it is announced by the builders, about June 1. While the weather for the winter, as a whole, has been most favorable to the progress of the work, there has been some unavoidable delay, it is stated, because of the failure to receive the structural iron on time. Since the first of the year work has been hurried along. There has been no working at night yet, but something in this line is expected before long.

As one stands in the midst of all this orderly confusion, he feels at a loss to know just where to begin an examination. Taking your life in your hands, you may mount one of the series of ladders to the staging up under the roof. It is a nightmare to walk along the temporary flooring, which is 68 feet from the floor of the auditorium, but which feels like 6800, as a plank gives a little under foot, but you are told it is all safe, except where the holes are, and you soon get courage to look around.

About you are a number of men engaged in putting together the framework of the ceiling, called the "furring," long strips of steel that are attached to the heavier girders which sustain the weight of the loft flooring. The pieces come unpunched, so there are machines for the purpose on the scene to cut holes for the rivets. They are operated by long levers like pump-handles, on which one or two men jump and bear down with all their weight. The framework already gives one an idea of the pattern of the ceiling, panelled out into squares, rectangles and simple crosses.

The roof is built, except that section over the Huntington avenue end. It is constructed of 2-inch plank, riveted with ¾-inch pine bolts. It is to be covered with a layer of tar paper of double thickness and copper sheathing.

Descending to the corridors, you find crews of men at work on the partitions of terra-cotta tiling, used on the sides and ceilings. Great piles of the red and yellow material are stacked up on the floor below.

Enough of the two balconies has been constructed to give one an idea of their strength. The framework is of different sizes of common structural girders and stringers. Supporting the entire framework are the posts, six in number at the main entrance. It is interesting to note that the posts are set very far in, so far that they will but little, if at all, obstruct the view of those sitting in the rear seats.

At the opposite end of the building work is being done about the stage, and the rooms adjacent will soon be partitioned off. The stage will be 58 feet in length and 25 in depth. In the rear will stand the great organ.

At work upon the floor are men engaged in distributing material. There are forges blazing away, and the scene suggests a blacksmith shop on a large scale. Around the sides of the area are a lot of pipes that attract your attention at once. They are for the temporary heating, to enable the work of plastering to proceed, and also to assist the various other workers.

One look down into the great cellar assures one that that is the place where the best show of all is going on. It takes on the appearance of construction work at night. Gasolene torches send forth their flickering rays, casting weird shadows, and there are a number of fires to add to the infernal aspect of the place. The fires serve various purposes—to thaw out the bricks that were in turn soaked and frozen by the variegated weather, and also to warm up the coffee and tea, bottles of which can be seen any day just before dinner standing around a safe distance from the flames.

Partitions are being put in for the kitchen, which is to be 48 by 27 feet; the janitor's room, engine room and carpenter shop. Much of the heating plant has already been installed, in the matter of two separate fires and boilers, the latter having a total capacity of about 600 pounds pressure. There will be 78 radiators, all told. Both, for the most part, will be regulated by an automatic arrangement which can be set for any zone of temperature required.

The building will furnish its own lighting by means of the two 100 horse-power and one 50 horse-power engine that will be installed in the basement. The work of wiring has already been begun.

There will be a large family of pumps along with the other mechanical apparatus—two for feed water, one for each of the tempering coils, one for fire extinguishing purposes, and one for the high pressure drips. There are a number of different kinds of tanks.

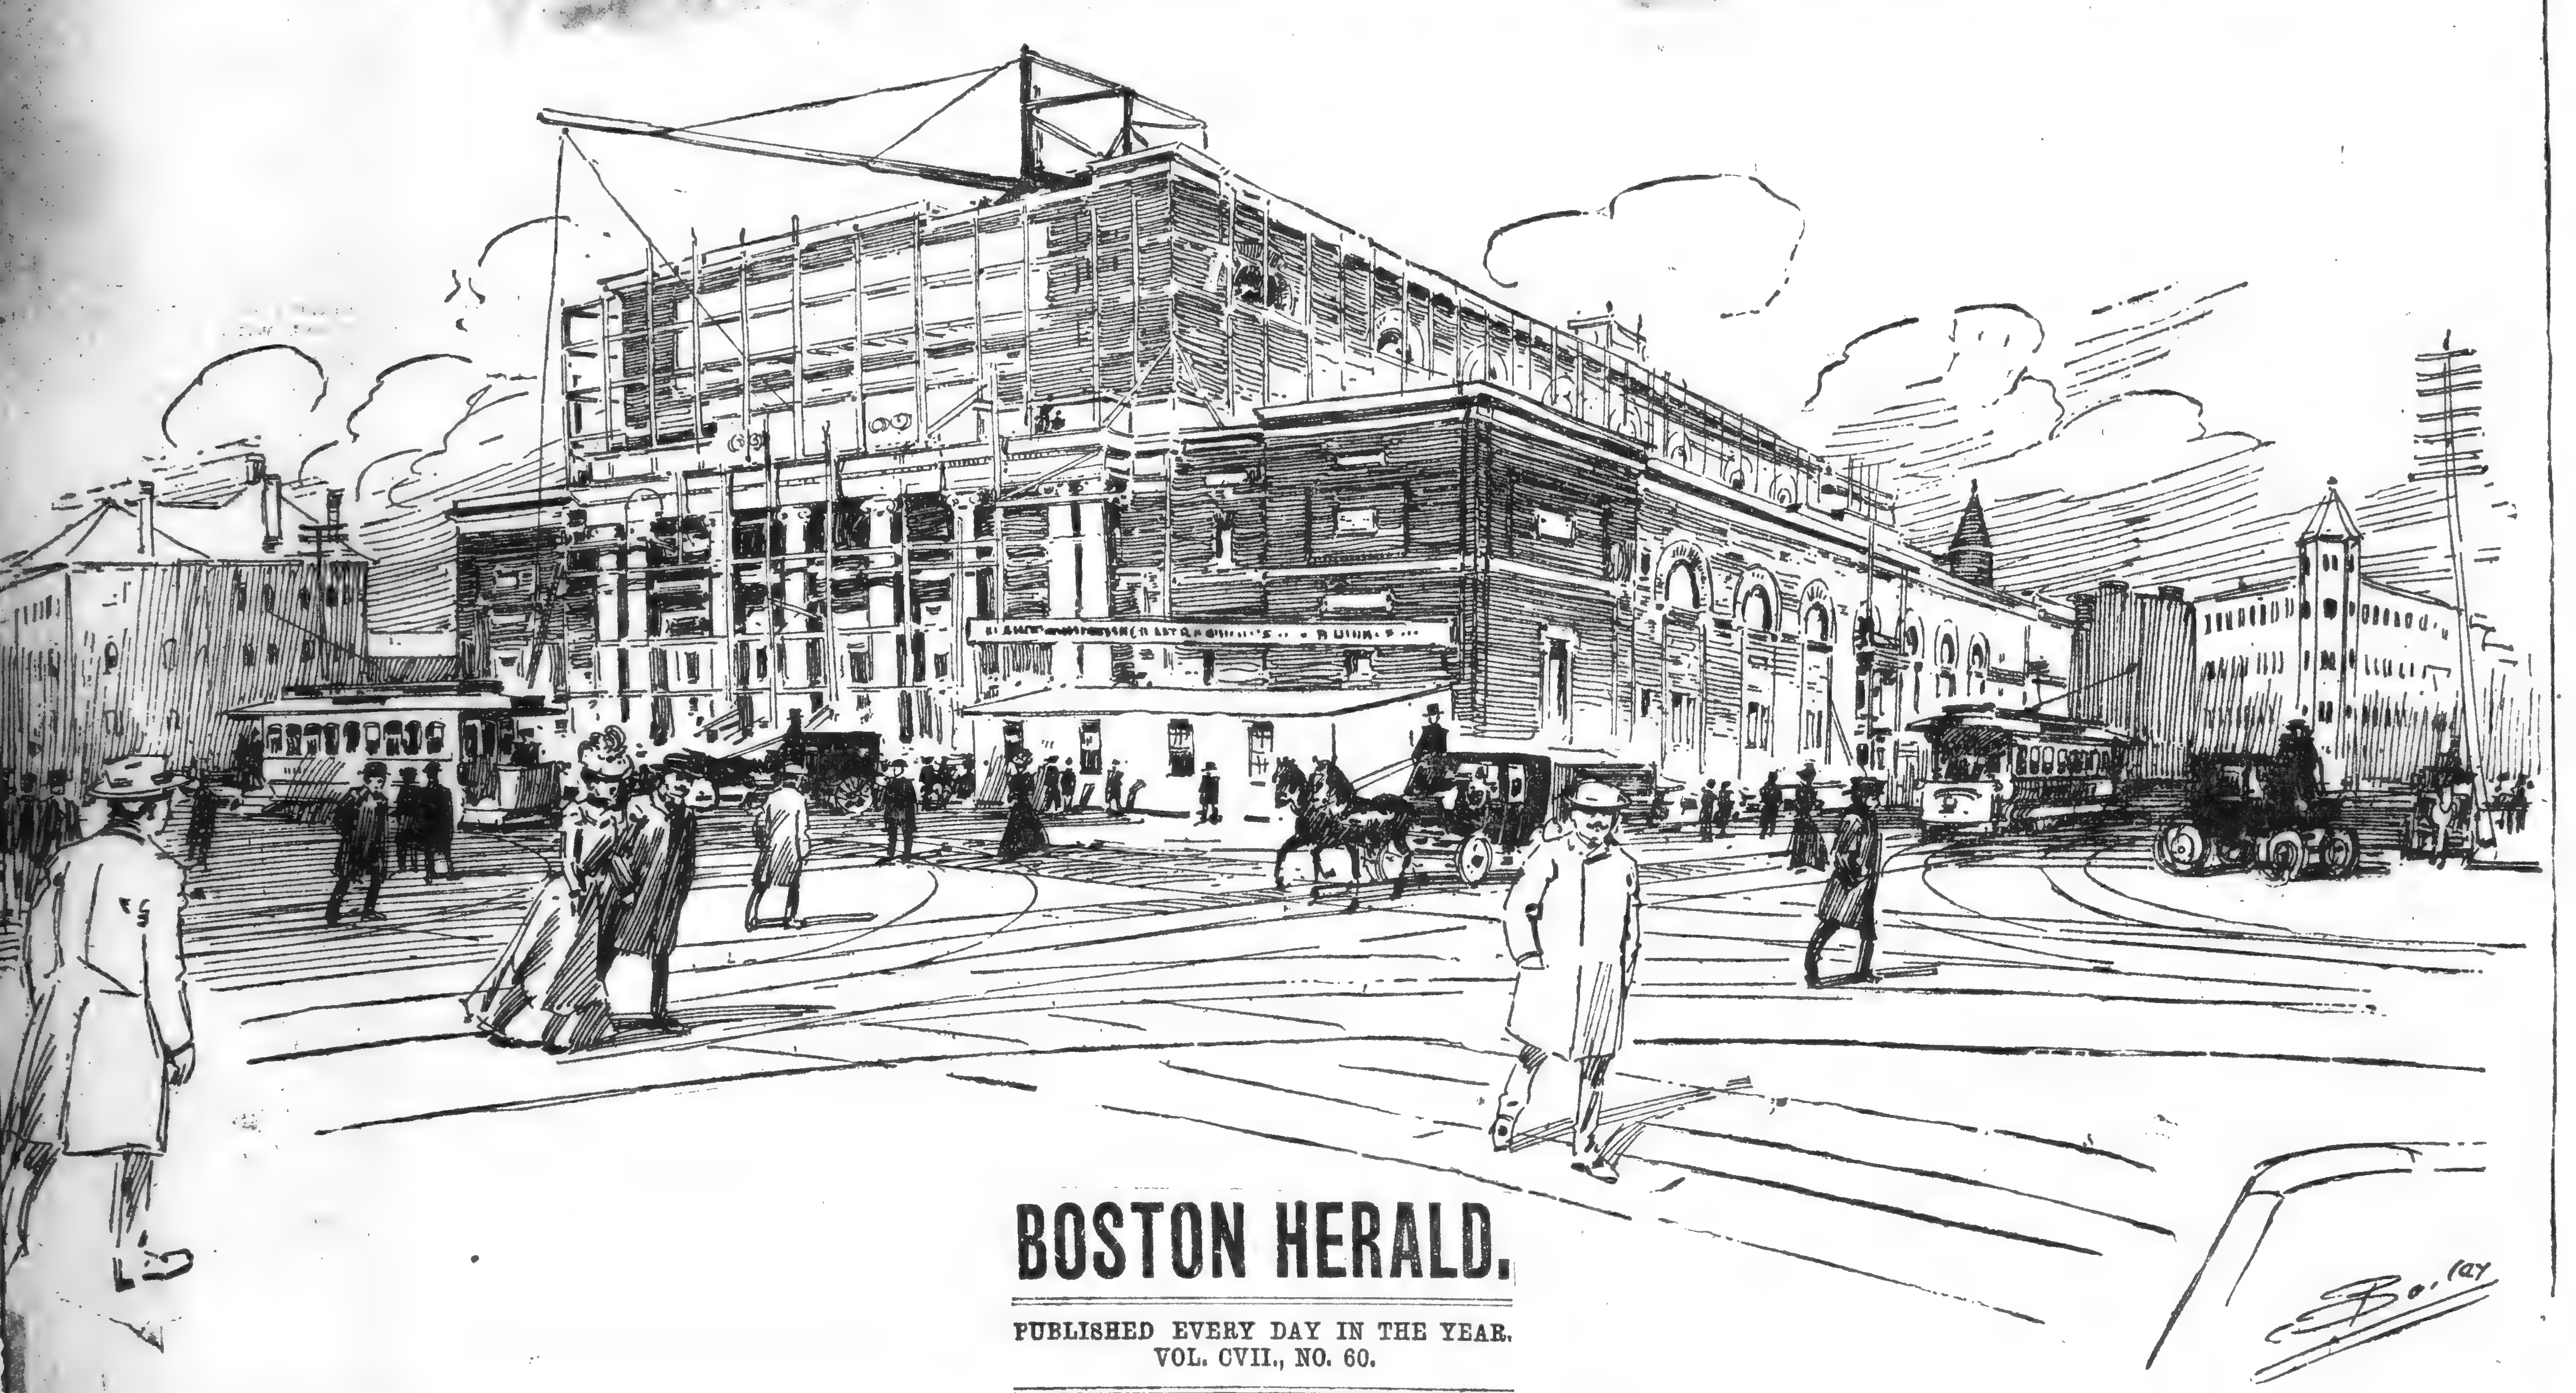
The building will be made fire-proof through the use of tiling, fire-brick and the iron flooring, which latter will extend throughout, even to the basement.

The facade of the building on Huntington avenue is now practically completed, and the general appearance of the columns with their Ionic capping is well seen through the staging which remains. The doorways have an ample appearance. The pillars support an entablature with a simple block and space work, surmounted with some scroll work. The material used is Indiana limestone.

The brick-work of the building is constructed on the Flemish style, with a "leader and a stretcher," so-called, alternating. That is, the exterior shows alternately, one over the other, the sides and the ends of the bricks.

In one's visit to the building, the little house of the architect and builder should not be forgotten. It is a cosey headquarters with a stove, a little black cat and everything to make the place pleasant. They will show you plans enough, one would suppose, for a good-sized city.

CUT-OUT



BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII., NO. 60.

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1900.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL AS IT NOW APPEARS.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1900

Progress of the New Music Hall

Two hundred men are variously engaged in the new Music Hall Building in process of erection on Huntington avenue, and in about two weeks from now the army of plasterers will put in an appearance. The weather this winter has been favorable for building, and had it not been for the occasional non-receipt of the structural iron there would have been no delays. The builders announce that the hall will be finished on June 1. The walls are practically closed in; the roof is built, except that part over the Huntington-avenue end, and the façade on Huntington avenue is practically completed. Enough of the two balconies has been built to give one an idea of their great strength. The framework is of different sizes of girders and stringers, while supporting the entire framework are posts set far in so as not to obstruct the view of persons in the rear seats. Work also is going on about the stage. This will be 58 by 25 feet, and in the rear will stand the great organ.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII., NO. 61.

FRIDAY, MARCH 2, 1900.

Don't forget there is a Symphony rehearsal today, girls. Make the most of the concerts, for the supply is running low, and just remember, too, while you are about it, that next season you'll be trekking up Massachusetts avenue, instead of down Winter street, when Friday comes along.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1900.

Mr. Gericke must refrain from playing Goldmark's overture "Sappho" in Philadelphia—at least until the storm blows over. It is true that Goldmark's heroine has two pp's in her name and lived in geographical not artistic Lesbos; but Philadelphians, who are stern moralists—except in matters of political bribery and corruption—are a little slow in comprehension, and we should not like to see Mr. Gericke beating the devil's tattoo in a dungeon cell for a year. The ancient Sappho was a little dark woman with black hair, and Alcaeus says that she had a beautiful smile. A charming creature, and we should like dearly to meet her in a better world, but just at present it is the part of prudence to feign ignorance about her doings; and also to say in a clear, bell-like voice, "I never read that dreadful book by Daudet."

THE MUSICAL COURIER. Feb 28

Leonora Jackson.

A PERUSAL of this page will give absolute proof of the decisive success of this talented violinist. She has been received everywhere with open arms, and the end of her victories is not yet:

New York.

The results of Miss Jackson's careful study and training, her technical merits and her natural talent were displayed to excellent advantage last night in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. It would be wrong to say that her full development has yet been reached, but she is a violinist of significant achievement. The audience applauded her with great enthusiasm.—New York Sun, February 23, 1900.

Leonora Jackson, who made her first appearance here with the Boston Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, was recalled nine times after playing Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor.

Miss Jackson won the audience as soon as she came on the stage. She has a peculiarly attractive manner, and this, added to her splendid equipment as a musician, established her in great favor. The big concerto is a severe tax on violinists of the first rank, but she came through the ordeal with triumph. She plays not only with great depth, but with the utmost facility. This was the young woman's second appearance in this city since her return from Europe, and she deepened the favorable impression she made at the first one.—New York Press, February 23, 1900.

The soloist was Miss Leonora Jackson, violinist, whose accomplished art has already won her a welcome here. She played the Mendelssohn Concerto in a masterly style, revealing a delicious tone in the beautiful andante and almost virile power in the brilliant finale.—New York Herald, February 23, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson, who has, during the last month or two, played with most of the leading musical organizations in this country, and been received with favor everywhere, made her second appearance in New York last night at the evening concert of the Boston Orchestra. She chose for this occasion the Mendelssohn Concerto. It has been played here by the world's greatest artists with a more seething tone, more variety and expression; but it would obviously be unfair to measure a young girl of twenty by the standard of Wilhelmj and Ysaye. Her playing at present evinces not only good training, skill and ease, but it is characterized by a girlish sweetness which makes a pleasant impression, especially in such music as Mendelssohn's. The large audience was immensely delighted with her playing, and at the end called her out more than half a dozen times.—New York Post, February 23, 1900.

As Miss Jackson played Mendelssohn's music last evening to the superb accompaniment of the Boston men, the depth and beauty of her tone, the dash and freedom of her style and the undoubted strength of her musical temperament were revealed in convincing fashion. In the second movement her violin fairly sang the lovely melody, while the last movement ended with splendid brilliancy.

Miss Jackson's musical status seems to rest on a firm basis. Her preparation and development are not yet complete, but one may look hopefully for continued progress in her art.—New York Mail and Express, February 23, 1900.

Debut in Boston with Orchestra.

Miss Leonora Jackson proved herself a thorough artist in many directions; pure intonation, clear harmonics, admirable surety, and elegance of style characterized her work. The concerto seemed to present no difficulties, and she took the final movement at a flying pace, yet without any trace of blurring or of insecurity. The pensive character of the slow movement was also charmingly brought out. In short, Miss Jackson has made as much of a success as the character of the composition would allow. She was recalled again and again, given floral tributes, and in every way received a welcome that was memorable. We hope to hear her in other works, for the Mendelssohn Concerto is by no means the yardstick that we should use to measure an artist by.—Louis C. Elson in Boston Daily Advertiser, February 19, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson was welcomed warmly and applauded heartily. She has had sound training. Her bowing is excellent, and the foundations of her general technic have been well laid; she has evidently studied hard and with commendable ambition. Her performance was commendable, creditable. I should like to hear her in a smaller hall and in a varied program. She certainly gives much promise, and her career will be watched with interest.—Philip Hale in Boston Journal, February 18, 1900.

Miss Jackson is a young artist of decided merit. Her tone is pure, and her intonation is admirable. She bows with largeness, freedom and grace, and her technic is able and fluent. Her style is intelligently artistic, and she plays with easy confidence. Both her reading and her performance of the concerto were steadily meritorious. She is evidently a very charming young lady and certainly plays with brilliancy, good taste and carefully trained skill. That she has marked talent was made fully clear, and it would seem that her future is well worth watching. She met with a very cordial welcome, and at the close of the concerto was applauded with extreme enthusiasm and recalled some four or five times.—Ben Woolf in Boston Herald, February 18, 1900.

Few young violinists have come to us burdened with such a weight of reputation as Miss Leonora Jackson. Well, heavy as it is, she does not stagger under it. What a wonderful bow arm she has—that anyone can see. But the searching beauty of her tone, the purity of her sentiment, her earnest concentration and fine musical instinct are of a very rare sort. She plays with authority, without a suspicion of bumptiousness. I think the maturity of her artistic development has been considerably overrated; she is still a young girl, feels like one, and plays as she feels.

I find much that is fine and genuine in her, so much that seems to show a potentiality of growth and ripening. All she needs is age; and there is no need of hothouse forcing. Let her grow up naturally. She has already had infinitely valuable experience in solo playing; she has reached the point where artists begin to develop themselves and forget the schoolmaster. With her talent and evident earnestness, her going right should be only a matter of time. As it is, she is eminently worth talking about; she is no zero, far from it.—W. F. Apthorp in Boston Evening Transcript, February 19, 1900.

The first pleasant thing to record of Miss Jackson is that she is an artist; there is nothing phenomenal about her playing; she does not surprise or startle, but she is always satisfying. She is a graceful and fluent player; the tone she produces is sweet and appealing. It is most carefully and conscientiously finished work, the product of study, thought and feeling, and there is nothing in it of the pupil repeating from memory. What Miss Jackson wishes to do her technical skill is fully capable of accomplishing, and as her judgment ripens and grows broader there is no reason to doubt that her art will keep pace with it. She is the admirable artist now, and there are many promises that in the maturity of her powers her triumph will equal her ambition. She made a most favorable impression.—Boston Gazette, February 17, 1900.

LEONORA JACKSON.

After a year or two of bombardment by printed encomiums from abroad concerning the talents and genius of Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, we have heard her play, and, wonder of wonders, the advance puffery was not so very much overdone. Miss Jackson is a very graceful and dignified girl, with a very charming stage presence and the evident knowledge of what to do before an audience. The mere physical part of her playing is exquisitely done, and her bowing is the acme of refinement and grace. She is admirably grounded in her technic, and shows the result of faithful work and splendid masters. Miss Jackson's tone is pure, rich, warm and poetically colored. She plays with remarkable ease and authority, and she is, by all odds, the most promising young woman player since Camilla Urso.—Wilber D. Quint in Boston Traveler, February 19, 1900.

A young and gifted girl, whose friends in her native city and elsewhere have followed with interest and pride her successes as a violinist abroad as well as at home, was welcomed with peculiar warmth.

For so young an artist, Miss Jackson displays remarkable power in her playing, and seems to be able to gain extraordinary effects without the slightest apparent effort. Her technical skill is of the highest order; her command of expression, as evidenced in the familiar and beautiful Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, might well be envied by many a virtuoso of high repute and much experience.

As regards purity of tone, Miss Jackson also merits cordial praise. Altogether, what with her unaffected style of playing and her modest, graceful bearing, she fairly conquered her first audience in Boston and gained recall after recall. Miss Jackson has good reason to feel well pleased at her reception by Boston's symphony assemblages.—Boston Sunday Globe, February 18, 1900.

Baltimore.

The judgment of Baltimore has been passed. Miss Jackson has accomplished the rare feat of living up to the advance notices, and the much advertised triumphs of the Old World have won their counterpart in the New.

It would be disregarding the sense of proportion to say that she ranks with a Sarasate, an Ysaye or a Joachim, yet this new star in the artistic firmament shines radiantly, and there is the promise of a great career for her. Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto with the ease of a master.

The feeling was that here was a woman that asks no odds of any man, but claimed her place as an artist, regardless of sex. She has a round, clear, firm tone, with an intonation that is mellow and pure. She revealed an unusually strong, almost masculine, bow arm, and her left arm technic is marvelous.—Baltimore American, February 21, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson excites attention because she is one of a very small number from a great army of students who go to Germany to study music and to become famous who are ever heard of after their return. Miss Jackson is, however, not only very fortunate but she is remarkably talented. She has command of an almost perfect technic, and while there may be traces of immaturity in her performance these will be corrected of themselves.—Baltimore Sun, February 21, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson has been heralded far and wide, and, after her work of last night, it is safe to say that the reputation she has established is deserving in every particular.

In the entire gamut of female violinists, including Powell, Lady Neruda, Tua, Urso, there is hardly one in which can be found the combination of virtuosa qualities displayed by Miss Jackson. Though of slight physique, she plays with a power and breadth of tone that is surprising. With this she combines the finesse at fingering and beauty in shading, such as helped to make the male masters of the instrument famous.

From the first stroke of her bow Miss Jackson had her audience won, and her work throughout, for a woman, was something in the nature of a revelation.—Baltimore Morning Herald, February 21, 1900.

Fall River.

The soloist, Miss Leonora Jackson, has a splendid mastery of the violin, a remarkable degree of ability in execution, and great freedom in handling the bow. Added to her great ability, Miss Jackson has the advantage of a most atractive appearance. She was enthusiastically recalled thrice.—Fall River Evening News, February 15, 1900.

The appearance of Miss Leonora Jackson, violin soloist, was awaited with much interest. It is safe to say that she upheld the reputation which the very kind things that had been printed about her had established for her in this city. Her playing of Mendelssohn's Concerto was rewarded with round after round of applause, which the young artist acknowledged with bows.—Fall River Daily Herald, February 15, 1900.

Miss Jackson is a great violinist. She displayed remarkable skill in technic and produced a wonderfully sweet tone. She scored a decided success, and her performance was, indeed, a remarkable achievement. She was recalled again and again to bow her acknowledgments to the enthusiastic applause of the audience and the members of the orchestra.—Fall River Daily Globe, February 15, 1900.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1900.

The matinée and evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, last week, brought forward as soloists Madame Sembrich and Miss Leonora Jackson. At the matinée, Madame Sembrich sang an aria from "Il Re Pastore," of Mozart, and the "Casta Diva," from "Norma;" the other numbers of the programme being the "Anacreon" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and "Three Hungarian Dances," of Brahms. Madame Sembrich sang beautifully, as she always does, and the enthusiasm displayed by the audience was unique for these concerts. The orchestra's work in the Cherubini overture was marked by classic repose and infinite finish in detail, but it was in Schubert's lovely symphony that their best work was done. Rarely have Schubert's soulful melodies been sung as sweetly or the rich charm of his harmonies been so skilfully revealed. The Brahms dances were played with abandon and marvellous virtuosity. Mendelssohn's violin concerto was played by Miss Jackson at the evening concert, and, as regards technique and intonation, was well played. The more soulful qualities, however, were somewhat lacking. Miss Jackson has been trained in the classic school, and by nature and temperament is best fitted for this school. Consequently her playing gives one the feeling of its being somewhat cold and gray. The Beethoven Symphony No. 8 was the pièce de resistance of the programme, for Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" proved somewhat of a disappointment, and the Berlioz overture, "King Lear," was hardly as perfectly given as might be desired. The Beethoven Symphony, however, was compensation for everything.

Feb 28

Leonora Jackson.

A PERUSAL of this page will give absolute proof of the decisive success of this talented violinist. She has been received everywhere with open arms, and the end of her victories is not yet:

New York.

The results of Miss Jackson's careful study and training, her technical merits and her natural talent were displayed to excellent advantage last night in the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. It would be wrong to say that her full development has yet been reached, but she is a violinist of significant achievement. The audience applauded her with great enthusiasm.—New York Sun, February 23, 1900.

Leonora Jackson, who made her first appearance here with the Boston Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, was recalled nine times after playing Mendelssohn's Concerto in E minor.

Miss Jackson won the audience as soon as she came on the stage. She has a peculiarly attractive manner, and this, added to her splendid equipment as a musician, established her in great favor. The big concerto is a severe tax on violinists of the first rank, but she came through the ordeal with triumph. She plays not only with great depth, but with the utmost facility. This was the young woman's second appearance in this city since her return from Europe, and she deepened the favorable impression she made at the first one.—New York Press, February 23, 1900.

The soloist was Miss Leonora Jackson, violinist, whose accomplished art has already won her a welcome here. She played the Mendelssohn Concerto in a masterly style, revealing a delicious tone in the beautiful andante and almost virile power in the brilliant finale.—New York Herald, February 23, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson, who has, during the last month or two, played with most of the leading musical organizations in this country, and been received with favor everywhere, made her second appearance in New York last night at the evening concert of the Boston Orchestra. She chose for this occasion the Mendelssohn Concerto. It has been played here by the world's greatest artists with a more seething tone, more variety and expression; but it would obviously be unfair to measure a young girl of twenty by the standard of Wilhelmj and Ysaye. Her playing at present evinces not only good training, skill and ease, but it is characterized by a girlish sweetness which makes a pleasant impression, especially in such music as Mendelssohn's. The large audience was immensely delighted with her playing, and at the end called her out more than half a dozen times.—New York Post, February 23, 1900.

As Miss Jackson played Mendelssohn's music last evening to the superb accompaniment of the Boston men, the depth and beauty of her tone, the dash and freedom of her style and the undoubted strength of her musical temperament were revealed in convincing fashion. In the second movement her violin fairly sang the lovely melody, while the last movement ended with splendid brilliancy.

Miss Jackson's musical status seems to rest on a firm basis. Her preparation and development are not yet complete, but one may look hopefully for continued progress in her art.—New York Mail and Express, February 23, 1900.

Debut in Boston with Orchestra.

Miss Leonora Jackson proved herself a thorough artist in many directions; pure intonation, clear harmonics, admirable surety, and elegance of style characterized her work. The concerto seemed to present no difficulties, and she took the final movement at a flying pace, yet without any trace of blurring or of insecurity. The pensive character of the slow movement was also charmingly brought out. In short, Miss Jackson has made as much of a success as the character of the composition would allow. She was recalled again and again, given floral tributes, and in every way received a welcome that was memorable. We hope to hear her in other works, for the Mendelssohn Concerto is by no means the yardstick that we should use to measure an artist by.—Louis C. Elson in Boston Daily Advertiser, February 19, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson was welcomed warmly and applauded heartily. She has had sound training. Her bowing is excellent, and the foundations of her general technic have been well laid; she has evidently studied hard and with commendable ambition. Her performance was commendable, creditable. I should like to hear her in a smaller hall and in a varied program. She certainly gives much promise, and her career will be watched with interest.—Philip Hale in Boston Journal, February 18, 1900.

Miss Jackson is a young artist of decided merit. Her tone is pure, and her intonation is admirable. She bows with largeness, freedom and grace, and her technic is able and fluent. Her style is intelligently artistic, and she plays with easy confidence. Both her reading and her performance of the concerto were steadily meritorious. She is evidently a very charming young lady and certainly plays with brilliancy, good taste and carefully trained skill. That she has marked talent was made fully clear, and it would seem that her future is well worth watching. She met with a very cordial welcome, and at the close of the concerto was applauded with extreme enthusiasm and recalled some four or five times.—Ben Woolf in Boston Herald, February 18, 1900.

Few young violinists have come to us burdened with such a weight of reputation as Miss Leonora Jackson. Well, heavy as it is, she does not stagger under it. What a wonderful bow arm she has—that anyone can see. But the searching beauty of her tone, the purity of her sentiment, her earnest concentration and fine musical instinct are of a very rare sort. She plays with authority, without a suspicion of bumptiousness I think the maturity of her artistic development has been considerably overrated; she is still a young girl, feels like one, and plays as she feels.

I find much that is fine and genuine in her, so much that seems to show a potentiality of growth and ripening. All she needs is age; and there is no need of hothouse forcing. Let her grow up naturally. She has already had infinitely valuable experience in solo playing; she has reached the point where artists begin to develop themselves and forget the schoolmaster. With her talent and evident earnestness, her going right should be only a matter of time. As it is, she is eminently worth talking about; she is no zero, far from it.—W. F. Apthorp in Boston Evening Transcript, February 19, 1900.

The first pleasant thing to record of Miss Jackson is that she is an artist; there is nothing phenomenal about her playing; she does not surprise or startle, but she is always satisfying. She is a graceful and fluent player; the tone she produces is sweet and appealing. It is most carefully and conscientiously finished work, the product of study, thought and feeling, and there is nothing in it of the pupil repeating from memory. What Miss Jackson wishes to do her technical skill is fully capable of accomplishing, and as her judgment ripens and grows broader there is no reason to doubt that her art will keep pace with it. She is the admirable artist now, and there are many promises that in the maturity of her powers her triumph will equal her ambition. She made a most favorable impression.—Boston Gazette, February 17, 1900.

LEONORA JACKSON.

After a year or two of bombardment by printed encomiums from abroad concerning the talents and genius of Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, we have heard her play, and, wonder of wonders, the advance puffery was not so very much overdone. Miss Jackson is a very graceful and dignified girl, with a very charming stage presence and the evident knowledge of what to do before an audience. The mere physical part of her playing is exquisitely done, and her bowing is the acme of refinement and grace. She is admirably grounded in her technic, and shows the result of faithful work and splendid masters. Miss Jackson's tone is pure, rich, warm and poetically colored. She plays with remarkable ease and authority, and she is, by all odds, the most promising young woman player since Camilla Urso.—Wilber D. Quint in Boston Traveler, February 19, 1900.

A young and gifted girl, whose friends in her native city and elsewhere have followed with interest and pride her successes as a violinist abroad as well as at home, was welcomed with peculiar warmth.

For so young an artist, Miss Jackson displays remarkable power in her playing, and seems to be able to gain extraordinary effects without the slightest apparent effort. Her technical skill is of the highest order; her command of expression, as evidenced in the familiar and beautiful Mendelssohn Concerto in E minor, might well be envied by many a virtuoso of high repute and much experience.

As regards purity of tone, Miss Jackson also merits cordial praise. Altogether, what with her unaffected style of playing and her modest, graceful bearing, she fairly conquered her first audience in Boston and gained recall after recall. Miss Jackson has good reason to feel well pleased at her reception by Boston's symphony assemblages.—Boston Sunday Globe, February 18, 1900.

Baltimore.

The judgment of Baltimore has been passed. Miss Jackson has accomplished the rare feat of living up to the advance notices, and the much advertised triumphs of the Old World have won their counterpart in the New.

It would be disregarding the sense of proportion to say that she ranks with a Sarasate, an Ysaye or a Joachim, yet this new star in the artistic firmament shines radiantly, and there is the promise of a great career for her. Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto with the ease of a master.

The feeling was that here was a woman that asks no odds of any man, but claimed her place as an artist, regardless of sex. She has a round, clear, firm tone, with an intonation that is mellow and pure. She revealed an unusually strong, almost masculine, bow arm, and her left arm technic is marvelous.—Baltimore American, February 21, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson excites attention because she is one of a very small number from a great army of students who go to Germany to study music and to become famous who are ever heard of after their return. Miss Jackson is, however, not only very fortunate but she is remarkably talented. She has command of an almost perfect technic, and while there may be traces of immaturity in her performance these will be corrected of themselves.—Baltimore Sun, February 21, 1900.

Miss Leonora Jackson has been heralded far and wide, and, after her work of last night, it is safe to say that the reputation she has established is deserving in every particular.

In the entire gamut of female violinists, including Powell, Lady Neruda, Tua, Urso, there is hardly one in which can be found the combination of virtuosa qualities displayed by Miss Jackson. Though of slight physique, she plays with a power and breadth of tone that is surprising. With this she combines the finesse at fingering and beauty in shading, such as helped to make the male masters of the instrument famous.

From the first stroke of her bow Miss Jackson had her audience won, and her work throughout, for a woman, was something in the nature of a revelation.—Baltimore Morning Herald, February 21, 1900.

Fall River.

The soloist, Miss Leonora Jackson, has a splendid mastery of the violin, a remarkable degree of ability in execution, and great freedom in handling the bow. Added to her great ability, Miss Jackson has the advantage of a most atractive appearance. She was enthusiastically recalled thrice.—Fall River Evening News, February 15, 1900.

The appearance of Miss Leonora Jackson, violin soloist, was awaited with much interest. It is safe to say that she upheld the reputation which the very kind things that had been printed about her had established for her in this city. Her playing of Mendelssohn's Concerto was rewarded with round after round of applause, which the young artist acknowledged with bows.—Fall River Daily Herald, February 15, 1900.

Miss Jackson is a great violinist. She displayed remarkable skill in technic and produced a wonderfully sweet tone. She scored a decided success, and her performance was, indeed, a remarkable achievement. She was recalled again and again to bow her acknowledgments to the enthusiastic applause of the audience and the members of the orchestra.—Fall River Daily Globe, February 15, 1900.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1900.

The matinée and evening concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, last week, brought forward as soloists Madame Sembrich and Miss Leonora Jackson. At the matinée, Madame Sembrich sang an aria from "Il Re Pastore," of Mozart, and the "Casta Diva," from "Norma;" the other numbers of the programme being the "Anacreon" overture, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," and "Three Hungarian Dances," of Brahms. Madame Sembrich sang beautifully, as she always does, and the enthusiasm displayed by the audience was unique for these concerts. The orchestra's work in the Cherubini overture was marked by classic repose and infinite finish in detail, but it was in Schubert's lovely symphony that their best work was done. Rarely have Schubert's soulful melodies been sung as sweetly or the rich charm of his harmonies been so skilfully revealed. The Brahms dances were played with abandon and marvellous virtuosity. Mendelssohn's violin concerto was played by Miss Jackson at the evening concert, and, as regards technique and intonation, was well played. The more soulful qualities, however, were somewhat lacking. Miss Jackson has been trained in the classic school, and by nature and temperament is best fitted for this school. Consequently her playing gives one the feeling of its being somewhat cold and gray. The Beethoven Symphony No. 8 was the pièce de resistance of the programme, for Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" proved somewhat of a disappointment, and the Berlioz overture, "King Lear," was hardly as perfectly given as might be desired. The Beethoven Symphony, however, was compensation for everything.

Boston Sunday Globe.

[illegible], MARCH 4, 1900.

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

[illegible] Gericke's symphony program last [illegible] of a [illegible] nature and [illegible]prised Beethoven's "Leonore" over[illegible] No. 3; Gluck's "Ballet Suite," [illegible] 2; the "Hamlet" overture by Tchaikowsky and Schumann's fourth sym[illegible]. There were no soloists. It is [illegible]less to say much about the inter[illegible]tation of the "Leonore" overture, the familiar number receiving the delicate [illegible] sympathetic rendition usually as[illegible]ated with the Boston orchestra. The [illegible]le performance was masterly. [illegible]k's ballet music, "put together by G[illegible]rt," was played admirably, the [illegible] fifth movement, possibly, call[illegible] special comment, although this [illegible], from the nature of its construc[illegible] and the thematic material employed, almost invariably proves to be the favorite number. The grace of the [illegible] movement, the humor of the second, and the odd, drone-like effects in the fourth were splendidly presented.

Tchaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture, so full of strenuous passage work, formed a striking contrast to the lighter music by Gluck, and the somber measures, harsh at times, were given with sonorous precision and effect. Despite the dissonant combinations so frequent in the composition the orchestration is wonderfully vivid and illustrates the "ghost" episode in the tragedy in a manner which is unquestionably typical and apropos to the subject. Each contingent of the orchestra did its work well and showed the almost perfect unanimity of execution which has made the ensemble playing by these men a matter of universal comment.

The concert closed with the fourth Schumann symphony, a great composition grandly performed. The second version was played and again the orchestra gave evidence of the splendid "team" work noticed in the Tchaikowsky overture. How differently Schumann treats his passionate episodes, as compared with those of the Russian composer, and yet without being as harsh to the average ear the German is fully as effective in his orchestration, and surely, as a rule, much more enjoyable. The praise given the orchestra for the "Hamlet" performance applies equally to that of the Schumann work.

Mr T. A[illegible]mowski will be the soloist at this [illegible]'s concerts. The program will include the Goldmark overture to "Sapho," "Symphony Espagnole" for violin, Lalo; "Moorish Dances," J. K. Paine, for the first time, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Boston Courier.

E-TABLISHED 1795. MARCH 3, 1900.

The seventeenth Symphony programme presented one novelty, in that it named no new work at all, being made up entirely of standard music. Had it begun—as it seemed to promise that it would—with the great and thrilling "Leonore No. 3" overture, it would have seemed top-heavy, not only because that is a music which should come as a finale to a concert, but because the selections which were to follow must have been thrown into comparative insignificance by it. So one of the other "Leonore" overtures (we should say that which is commonly known as No. 1 and classed in the opus list as 72 led off, inducing a quiet, dignified and not unsympathetic mood, touched with some warmth of feeling. Gevaert's group of ballet movements chosen from Gluck's operas, each suggestive in its way of some noble and yet vital poetry of motion, came next, and then Mr. Gericke presented Tschaikowsky's fantasy-overture of "Hamlet," so sombre, gloomy and compelsive with its unescapable sepulchral forcefulness, as a basis to everything else, as of "this fellow in the cellarage" which must always be dwelling and moving under all other life, and its "wild and whirling confusion of passions, thoughts, interests and activities, forming sometimes into the shape and march of battle, and sometimes melting into a moment of quiet pathos and serenity, only to yield at last to the dominant dark heaviness. Schumann's wholesome, kindly beneficent fourth symphony ended the concert, during which everything had been perfectly played and intimately enjoyed.

At the next concert Mr. T. Adamowski will play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin solo, and the orchestras will give (for the first time) some Moorish dances, by Professor John K. Paine, Beethoven's seventh symphony, and Goldmark's "Sapho" overture—the prevalent [illegible] escaped, apparently, although this is the other Sappho!

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Program of Reasonable Interest —Revival of Old Ballet Music— Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet."

The program of the 17th Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture "Leonore," No. 1.........Beethoven
Ballet Suit No. 2..............Gluck-Gevaert
From "Iphigenia in Aulis"........
I. Air.
II. Dance of Slaves.
III. Tambourin.
From "Armida"......................
IV. Gavotte.
From "Iphigenia in Aulis"........
V. Chaconne.
Overture "Hamlet"..............Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D minor.............Schumann

Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" was played for the first time at a Philharmonic concert in St. Petersburg, Nov. 24, 1888. The composer led it, and his symphony No. 5, which was also performed for the first time. I have read somewhere that these two works were played a short time before this at a concert of the Russian Music Society, but I do not find them on the programs of that society in 1888. The overture was played at Brooklyn, Feb. 14, 1891; Chicago, March 26, 1891; New York, April 11, 1891, and in Boston, March 5, 1892. As a whole, this fantasy-overture is not as effective inherently or superficially as either the "Romeo and Juliet" or the "Francesca da Rimini." The introduction, which announces the appearance of the Ghost is strong and suggestive; the second theme—the Ophelia theme, if you please—is of melancholy beauty, and there is the thought of the crazed maiden singing her simple tunes; but there is no long continued sweep of imagination, nor are the contrasting moods firmly established. Even the music accompanying the appearance of the Ghost did not make as striking an impression as when it was first played here; at least such is my recollection; for when the horns first sounded the dead of night, the crash that followed, as though all nature was dismayed at the sight of the awful apparition that walked in majesty the platform at Elsinore, was the one passage of the overture that remained in the memory. But we were not so accustomed to Tschaikowsky in 1892. After all, what music written to this tragedy is in any way worthy of the subject? Surely not Mr. Henschel's dismal suite. I do not think Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem is among his most characteristic works. Gade's overture is amiably melancholy. Once in Paris I heard Berlioz's funeral march in Hamlet, with a cannon "to be fired without"; but how many remember that the Prince of Denmark was a soldier, one praised by Fortinbras? Tschaikowsky in "Hamlet" does not illuminate the tragedy as he illuminates the tale of the lovers of Verona or the story of Francesca. Suppose you are a musician and you try to put "Hamlet" into music, what moods are there for you to portray? The feeling of the supernatural; the irresolution of the hero; the fleeting presence of the fair Ophelia. Tschaikowsky was only moderately successful in the first and third, and he failed in the second. But to put Hamlet himself into music is no easy task. Furthermore, the finale is too laconic in expression of grief; it is as though the lamentation were abruptly checked; there is the thought of a dash, rather than a period.

⁂

The other pieces on the program do not call for extended comment. The first overture to "Leonore" is interesting chiefly because it is so different from the third, yet there are passages in it that only Beethoven could have written, passages that are of elemental simplicity, tenderness and depth of thought.

I do not care to hear the ballet music of Gluck in the concert hall. His music of this nature demands the stage setting and action. They that have seen the "Iphigenia in Aulis" and "Alceste" and the other "Iphigenia" in German cities know how overpowering is the general effect of a carefully prepared, sympathetic performance. Even the thin, naive ballet music contributes to this effect. Mr. Apthorpe remarks truly that the gavotte is not in the customary gavotte rhythm, but the movement is nevertheless a gavotte. Gluck and writers of piano music in the 18th century were not always punctilious in these matters. The passacaglia, for instance, is characteristically in 3-4, but Gluck has a passacaglia in "Alceste" that is in 2-4, and this is not a solitary exception.

Weingartner regards the D minor symphony of Schumann as inferior to the first and the second of the same composer. I fail to see why. It is true that Schumann's symphonies might as well have been written for a piano and four hands as for an orchestra as he understood it; but surely this symphony of peculiarly romantic flavor does not fall behind its companions, and the rhythmic treatment of the trio in the scherzo adds wondrously to the gentle regret and vague longing of the musical thought.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY [illegible]LD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 63.

SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1 Finely Played.

Some Confusion Left in the Reader's Mind After a Perusal of the Programme Book—The Gluck Suite of Dances Heard for the First Time in a Decade or More.

The programme for the 17th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138..Beethoven
Suite from "Iphigenie en Aulis"........Gluck
Overture, "Hamlet"..............Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 4.......................Schumann

The "Leonore" overture, No. 1, is not heard as often as are the three other overtures that Beethoven composed for his opera, but it is none the less interesting, if somewhat lighter than these, and in quite another vein from the wonderful No. 3 and the "Fidelio."

Much has been written in the way of dispute over the proper numbering of the "Leonore" overtures, and the date of their composition, and the subject is, notwithstanding, still left in some confusion, a fact which may probably account for the programme book describing No. 3, instead of No. 1. However, as the person with a not wholly perfect knowledge of French exclaimed, "Quel odds?"

Those who followed the text of the programme book, analyzing the overture that was not played, while listening to the one that was, appeared to be pleasingly edified, and so it is fair to suspect that no very great harm was caused by the blunder. It is equally fair to suspect that they were less edified by the argument anent the history of the three overtures, given in the book.

For example, in speaking of the Overture No. 1, the information was conveyed that "all external evidence now points to its having been written after the (so-called) Nos. 2 and 3, and to its being properly No. 3 and not No. 1. But many musicians refuse to believe the external evidence, which is not wholly conclusive, to be sure, although it is known that the (so-called) No. 2 was considered too long in Beethoven's day, and the (so-called) No 3, too heavy and difficult, and that the composer was asked to write a lighter overture to his opera, finding it absolutely incredible that Beethoven, after remodelling No. 2 into No. 3 (both these overtures are written upon the same general plan and of almost identically the same thematic material), should subsequently have fallen so much below the mighty No. 3 as to put out this far lighter No. 1."

What with the all external evidence that points to its having been written after Nos. 2 and 3, and the same external evidence which is not wholly conclusive, and the "so-called" this and that, and the perplexing length of the sentence with its befogging reiterations to the effect that 2 is not 3, and 3 is not 1, and 1 is not 2, and so on, to say nothing of the roundabout method taken to express a simple fact, the writer of the programme-book article would be justified in offering a prize to any one who can and will solve the ingenious and ingenuous verbal puzzle here presented.

But if the argument was something of a muddle, the reading and performance of the work were exquisitely clear, sympathetic and charming.

The Gevaert arrangement of the Gluck suite of dances from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and "Armida," had not been heard at these concerts since their first performance, a decade or more ago. The quaint, pretty and naive tunes, with their simple grace, and easy flow, were reheard with genuine pleasure, and the vigorous and brilliant chaconne with something more in the form of delighted admiration. If Gluck could have listened to them as read by Mr. Gericke and played by his splendid orchestra, it is by no means unlikely that he would have wondered how much finer they were made to sound than he ever dreamed they could be.

The Tschaikowsky overture is among his most noble and impressive works. It is true that the ghost of Hamlet's father is somewhat overboisterous, and that what must be deemed the Ophelia theme would have been better if it were more unsophisticated; but on the whole, the composer is heard here at his very best, and in a vein that never for a moment relaxes in its large dignity. A remarkably strong and richly colored interpretation of it was accorded.

The Schumann symphony, it need hardly be said, was done full justice to, by both conductor and orchestra.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sapho," Goldmark; "Symphonie Espagnol," for violin and orchestra, Lalo; "Moorish Dances," J. K. Paine (first time), and Symphony No. 7, Beethoven. Mr. T. Adamowski is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1900.

SEVENTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr Gericke's symphony program last week was of a conservative nature and comprised Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3; Gluck's "Ballet Suite," No. 2; the "Hamlet" overture by Tchaikowsky and Schumann's fourth symphony. There were no soloists. It is needless to say much about the interpretation of the "Leonore" overture, the familiar number receiving the delicate and sympathetic rendition usually associated with the Boston orchestra. The whole performance was masterly. Gluck's ballet music, "put together by Gevaert," was played admirably, the brilliant fifth movement, possibly, calling for special comment, although this part, from the nature of its construction and the thematic material employed, almost invariably proves to be the favorite number. The grace of the first movement, the humor of the second, and the odd, drone-like effects in the fourth were splendidly presented.

Tchaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture, so full of strenuous passage work, formed a striking contrast to the lighter music by Gluck, and the somber measures, harsh at times, were given with sonorous precision and effect. Despite the dissonant combinations so frequent in the composition the orchestration is wonderfully vivid and illustrates the "ghost" episode in the tragedy in a manner which is unquestionably typical and apropos to the subject. Each contingent of the orchestra did its work well and showed the almost perfect unanimity of execution which has made the ensemble playing by these men a matter of universal comment.

The concert closed with the fourth Schumann symphony, a great composition grandly performed. The second version was played and again the orchestra gave evidence of the splendid "team" work noticed in the Tchaikowsky overture. How differently Schumann treats his passionate episodes, as compared with those of the Russian composer, and yet without being as harsh to the average ear the German is fully as effective in his orchestration, and surely, as a rule, much more enjoyable. The praise given the orchestra for the "Hamlet" performance applies equally to that of the Schumann work.

Mr T. Adamowski will be the soloist at this week's concerts. The program will include the Goldmark overture to "Sapho," "Symphony Espagnole" for violin, Lalo; "Moorish Dances," J. K. Paine, for the first time, and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. MARCH 3, 1900.

The seventeenth Symphony programme presented one novelty, in that it named no new work at all, being made up entirely of standard music. Had it begun—as it seemed to promise that it would—with the great and thrilling "Leonore No. 3" overture, it would have seemed top-heavy, not only because that is a music which should come as a finale to a concert, but because the selections which were to follow must have been thrown into comparative insignificance by it. So one of the other "Leonore" overtures (we should say that which is commonly known as No. 1 and classed in the opus list as 72 led off, inducing a quiet, dignified and not unsympathetic mood, touched with some warmth of feeling. Gevaert's group of ballet movements chosen from Gluck's operas, each suggestive in its way of some noble and yet vital poetry of motion, came next, and then Mr. Gericke presented Tschaikowsky's fantasy-overture of "Hamlet," so sombre, gloomy and compulsive with its unescapable sepulchral forcefulness, as a basis to everything else, as of "this fellow in the cellarage" which must always be dwelling and moving under all other life, and its "wild and whirling confusion of passions, thoughts, interests and activities, forming sometimes into the shape and march of battle, and sometimes melting into a moment of quiet pathos and serenity, only to yield at last to the dominant dark heaviness. Schumann's wholesome, kindly beneficent fourth symphony ended the concert, during which everything had been perfectly played and intimately enjoyed.

At the next concert Mr. T. Adamowski will play Lalo's "Spanish Symphony" for violin solo, and the orchestras will give (for the first time) some Moorish dances, by Professor John K. Paine, Beethoven's seventh symphony, and Goldmark's "Sapho" overture—the prevalent topic cannot be escaped, apparently, although this is the other Sappho!

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Program of Reasonable Interest—Revival of Old Ballet Music—Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet."

The program of the 17th Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture "Leonore," No. 1	Beethoven
Ballet Suit No. 2	Gluck-Gevaert
From "Iphigenia in Aulis"
I. Air.
II. Dance of Slaves.
III. Tambourin.
From "Armida"
IV. Gavotte.
From "Iphigenia in Aulis"
V. Chaconne.
Overture "Hamlet"	Tschaikowsky
Symphony in D minor	Schumann

Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" was played for the first time at a Philharmonic concert in St. Petersburg, Nov. 24, 1888. The composer led it, and his symphony No. 5, which was also performed for the first time. I have read somewhere that these two works were played a short time before this at a concert of the Russian Music Society, but I do not find them on the programs of that society in 1888. The overture was played at Brooklyn, Feb. 14, 1891; Chicago, March 26, 1891; New York, April 11, 1891, and in Boston, March 5, 1892. As a whole, this fantasy-overture is not as effective inherently or superficially as either the "Romeo and Juliet" or the "Francesca da Rimini." The introduction, which announces the appearance of the Ghost is strong and suggestive; the second theme—the Ophelia theme, if you please—is of melancholy beauty, and there is the thought of the crazed maiden singing her simple tunes; but there is no long continued sweep of imagination, nor are the contrasting moods firmly established. Even the music accompanying the appearance of the Ghost did not make as striking an impression as when it was first played here; at least such is my recollection; for when the horns first sounded the dead of night, the crash that followed, as though all nature was dismayed at the sight of the awful apparition that walked in majesty the platform at Elsinore, was the one passage of the overture that remained in the memory. But we were not so accustomed to Tschaikowsky in 1892. After all, what music written to this tragedy is in any way worthy of the subject? Surely not Mr. Henschel's dismal suite. I do not think Mr. MacDowell's symphonic poem is among his most characteristic works. Gade's overture is amiably melancholy. Once in Paris I heard Berlioz's funeral march in Hamlet, with a cannon "to be fired without"; but how many remember that the Prince of Denmark was a soldier, one praised by Fortinbras? Tschaikowsky in "Hamlet" does not illuminate the tragedy as he illuminates the tale of the lovers of Verona or the story of Francesca. Suppose you are a musician and you try to put "Hamlet" into music, what moods are there for you to portray? The feeling of the supernatural; the irresolution of the hero; the fleeting presence of the fair Ophelia. Tschaikowsky was only moderately successful in the first and third, and he failed in the second. But to put Hamlet himself into music is no easy task. Furthermore, the finale is too laconic in expression of grief; it is as though the lamentation were abruptly checked; there is the thought of a dash, rather than a period.

⁂

The other pieces on the program do not call for extended comment. The first overture to "Leonore" is interesting chiefly because it is so different from the third, yet there are passages in it that only Beethoven could have written, passages that are of elemental simplicity, tenderness and depth of thought.

I do not care to hear the ballet music of Gluck in the concert hall. His music of this nature demands the stage setting and action. They that have seen the "Iphigenia in Aulis" and "Alceste" and the other "Iphigenia" in German cities know how everpowering is the general effect of a carefully prepared, sympathetic performance. Even the thin, naive ballet music contributes to this effect. Mr. Apthorpe remarks truly that the gavotte is not in the customary gavotte rhythm, but the movement is nevertheless a gavotte. Gluck and writers of piano music in the 18th century were not always punctilious in these matters. The passacaglia, for instance, is characteristically in 3-4, but Gluck has a passacaglia in "Alceste" that is in 2-4, and this is not a solitary exception.

Weingartner regards the D minor symphony of Schumann as inferior to the first and the second of the same composer. I fail to see why. It is true that Schumann's symphonies might as well have been written for a piano and four hands as for an orchestra as he understood it; but surely this symphony of peculiarly romantic flavor does not fall behind its companions, and the rhythmic treatment of the trio in the scherzo adds wondrously to the gentle regret and vague longing of the musical thought.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 63.
SUNDAY, MARCH 4, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 1 Finely Played.

Some Confusion Left in the Reader's Mind After a Perusal of the Programme Book—The Gluck Suite of Dances Heard for the First Time in a Decade or More.

The programme for the 17th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138	Beethoven
Suite from "Iphigenie en Aulis"	Gluck
Overture, "Hamlet"	Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 4	Schumann

The "Leonore" overture, No. 1, is not heard as often as are the three other overtures that Beethoven composed for his opera, but it is none the less interesting, if somewhat lighter than these, and in quite another vein from the wonderful No. 3 and the "Fidelio."

Much has been written in the way of dispute over the proper numbering of the "Leonore" overtures, and the date of their composition, and the subject is, notwithstanding, still left in some confusion, a fact which may probably account for the programme book describing No. 3, instead of No. 1. However, as the person with a not wholly perfect knowledge of French exclaimed, "Quel odds?"

Those who followed the text of the programme book, analyzing the overture that was not played, while listening to the one that was, appeared to be pleasingly edified, and so it is fair to suspect that no very great harm was caused by the blunder. It is equally fair to suspect that they were less edified by the argument anent the history of the three overtures, given in the book.

For example, in speaking of the Overture No. 1, the information was conveyed that "all external evidence now points to its having been written after the (so-called) Nos. 2 and 3, and to its being properly No. 3 and not No. 1. But many musicians refuse to believe the external evidence, which is not wholly conclusive, to be sure, although it is known that the (so-called) No. 2 was considered too long in Beethoven's day, and the (so-called) No 3, too heavy and difficult, and that the composer was asked to write a lighter overture to his opera, finding it absolutely incredible that Beethoven, after remodelling No. 2 into No. 3 (both these overtures are written upon the same general plan and of almost identically the same thematic material), should subsequently have fallen so much below the mighty No. 3 as to put out this far lighter No. 1."

What with the all external evidence that points to its having been written after Nos. 2 and 3, and the same external evidence which is not wholly conclusive, and the "so-called" this and that, and the perplexing length of the sentence with its befogging reiterations to the effect that 2 is not 3, and 3 is not 1, and 1 is not 2, and so on, to say nothing of the roundabout method taken to express a simple fact, the writer of the programme-book article would be justified in offering a prize to any one who can and will solve the ingenious and ingenuous verbal puzzle here presented.

But if the argument was something of a muddle, the reading and performance of the work were exquisitely clear, sympathetic and charming.

The Gevaert arrangement of the Gluck suite of dances from "Iphigenia in Aulis," and "Armida," had not been heard at these concerts since their first performance, a decade or more ago. The quaint, pretty and naive tunes, with their simple grace, and easy flow, were reheard with genuine pleasure, and the vigorous and brilliant chaconne with something more in the form of delighted admiration. If Gluck could have listened to them as read by Mr. Gericke and played by his splendid orchestra, it is by no means unlikely that he would have wondered how much finer they were made to sound than he ever dreamed they could be.

The Tschaikowsky overture is among his most noble and impressive works. It is true that the ghost of Hamlet's father is somewhat overboisterous, and that what must be deemed the Ophelia theme would have been better if it were more unsophisticated; but on the whole, the composer is heard here at his very best, and in a vein that never for a moment relaxes in its large dignity. A remarkably strong and richly colored interpretation of it was accorded.

The Schumann symphony, it need hardly be said, was done full justice to, by both conductor and orchestra.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sapho," Goldmark; "Symphonie Espagnol," for violin and orchestra, Lalo; "Moorish Dances," J. K. Paine (first time), and Symphony No. 7, Beethoven. Mr. T. Adamowski is to be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 5, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—The "Hamlet" Overture.

The concert of Saturday presented a wholly orchestral programme and one which can have short shrift, for its first and last numbers were fairly familiar, and the other pieces were not altogether new.

The concert began with the "Leonora No. 1" overture, one of the least effective of the four overtures which Beethoven wrote for his single opera. One cannot help wishing that more ingenuity had been displayed in the nomenclature of these overtures; "Leonora No. 1" sounds more like the name of a fire engine than of a romantic overture, and one is apt to mix up the numerals, as happened on this occasion, when many an auditor read the description of "No. 3" and tried to identify "No. 1" by it. The work is not nearly as dramatic as "No. 2" or "No. 3." It does not give the entrance of the governor and the defeat of Pizarro's treacherous schemes, or the delirious joy of Leonora and her spouse, but abstains from any exhibition of extreme passion of any sort. It was expressively played and received its share of applause.

Pere Gevaert, the prince of musical antiquaries, always loved to dabble in Gluck, who seemed to him the ideal of dramatic power; his views are not shared by those who are spoiled by over-much of Richard Strauss and Berlioz. The suite which the old Belgian has made from three of Gluck's operas seemed a trifle under-spiced. Its orchestration was eminently conservative, the strings doing most of the work and the tone-coloring being somewhat monotonous. The dance of the Slaves was the most piquant number.

The idealization of the dance-rhythms which was so freely done in the old Suites, found amply exemplification here in the freedom of the Gavotte and the speed of the Chaconne.

The Gavotte, as a dance, began on the third beat of a quadruple rhythm, and had a dainty syncopation throughout; but this effect was not apparent here. The Chaconne was originally a slow dance, in triple rhythm, but little less stately than the Sarabande. When the French composers began to use it as the finale of their ballets they quickened the tempo and changed the character of the old Spanish dance. Bach's famous Chaconne (for violin solo) deviates greatly from the dance style, and Gluck's final Chaconne in this suite had scarcely a vestige of the old Chaconne character. But after all, these changes are no greater than those made in modern dances by later composers; a waltz, for example, danced to Rubinstein's "Valse Caprice" would be dangerously near a Cancan, while a dancing dervish could scarcely keep up with some parts of Chopin's waltz, op. 64, No. 1.

To follow Beethoven's gentlest overture with Gluck's suave music was not exactly piling Ossa upon Pelion, it was rather pouring oil upon a placid lake; now, however, there came a vivid contrast and the modern dissonances were let loose in Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" overture. No man outside of our art ever gave so much to music as Shakespeare; all of his plays are interwoven with musical creation and some have inspired every kind of composition from song to overture, from symphony to opera. Probably "Romeo and Juliet" and "Hamlet" have been the most frequently set and in the most varied forms. Even the gentle Gade (whom scoffers called "Mrs. Mendelssohn") being a Dane, tried to make an overture out of the Danish prince. He failed, and Tschaikowsky has only half-succeeded.

It may be doubted whether the extremely subtle character of Hamlet is fitted for musical portrayal; philosophy might busy itself with a study of the vacillating moods which Shakespeare has here depicted, but to give a tonal representation of anything like "To be or not to be," is to take music into the realm of metaphysics, which some of the ultra-moderns have attempted with very unsatisfactory results.

In this case, if Tschaikowsky did not play "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet omitted, he at least minimized the melancholy Dane and allowed his father's ghost to occupy the foreground. Here music was within its province, for a spirit can be depicted as well by tones as by words, and there are many ghost-stories in music, as witness King Ninus in "Semiramide" appearing to tamtam strokes, or the Commendatore in "Don Giovanni" giving supernatural growls to trombone accompaniment. Therefore when the muted horm struck twelve o'clock in a very dismal and foreboding manner, one was ready for the terrible picture which the poet has put in the words:—

"I could a tale unfold, whose lightest word
Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood,
Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres,
Thy knotted and combined locks to part,
And each particular hair to stand on end,
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine."

Here the Russian composer was upon his own ground, for the voice of darkness and foreboding becomes him best. The gloomy orchestration, the wind instruments in sombre chords in deepest register, the mastery of dissonance without extreme harshness, combined to picture the perturbed spirit in a manner that was generally dignified and impressive, if occasionally a little too vehement or bombastic.

[illegible] contra, [illegible] it was she, upon the oboe (and gloriously played it was), seemed rather artificial in her melancholy, while Hamlet, relegated to the background, was very seldom found in her company. The gong was frequently employed, in connection with the ghost, with a fortissimo effect that suggested a railway restaurant. But Tschaikowsky always has something to say, even if he sometimes says it in a frenzied manner.

The Schumann symphony, No. 4, in D minor, received a noble reading. Here the beauty of thought can never grow threadbare, and the free form is to be condoned since the ingenious figure treatment gives a sustained interest and continuity.

The violoncello had a good opportunity in the second movement, a directly melodic song form, which is so serenade-like that Schumann at first scored its accompaniment for guitar (as Rossini used guitar in Almaviva's serenade in the "Barber," and Mozart used mandolin to support Don Giovanni's nocturnal wooing), and the part was excellently performed. The third movement is one of Schumann's serious Scherzos, almost as paradoxical as Shakespeare's "Merry Dump," but very beautiful nevertheless.

It was once held that Schumann went as far in the direction of dissonance as it was safe to proceed, and the finale of this work is an instance of his boldness in this field. But later composers have gone far beyond the old Pillars of Hercules, and have discovered seas of discords that make this movement seem quite conservative.

The symphony must have given the keenest pleasure to every music lover, even though there is little new to say about it.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 5, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The seventeenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, the programme being:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 1, opus 138.
Gluck: Ballet Suite No. 2, put together by F.-A. Gevaert.
Tchaikovsky: "Hamlet," Fantasy-Overture, opus 67.
Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120.

I went, this time, to the public rehearsal, on Friday afternoon, instead of to the concert; but the (so-called) rehearsal is one in name only, and is virtually as much a performance as the concert itself.

By some mistake, the "Leonore" overture No. 3, opus 72, was set down on the programme, instead of the No. 1. This later and lighter work is not often played; Beethoven himself was not well satisfied with it, and it was never used in his lifetime in connection with the opera. He wrote it by request, the earlier overtures to "Leonare," Nos. 2 and 3, having been considered too long and heavy; but his dissatisfaction with it seems amply proved by his afterward writing the equally light, but far stronger overture (so-called) to "Fidelio," in E major. Though not showing Beethoven at his mightiest, this No. 1 is still a graceful, charming work; it is strikingly characteristic of the composer's individuality, the themes are nothing but Beethovenish. To my mind, two points make it still interesting and worth hearing; the admirably beautiful episode in the middle, on Florestan's "In des Lebens Frühlingstagen," and one passage in the Allegro itself, the earliest instance I know of in music of what has since been called the "Rossini crescendo"—repeating a single phrase twelve times twice in the tonic (twice in the dominant, and so on), in continuous crescendo, with stronger instrumentation after every fourth time. The Florestan episode seems to me far more beautifully scored than in either the No. 2 or the No. 3; it is a gem of orchestral coloring. The overture was capitally played.

The Gluck selections—airs de ballet from "Iphigénie en Aulide" and "Armida," strung together as a suite by Gevaert—are charming as need be. What a wealth of simple, soulful melody Gluck had! And how coruscatingly brilliant he could be at times! It seems to me that one mistake was made in the performance; Mr. Gericke apparently mistook the "tambourin" in the third movement for a tambourine—for it was on the latter instrument that the part was played. To be sure, Gluck, as a German, may have written "tambourin" when he meant "tambourine," not knowing the difference between the masculine and the feminine form of the word. But there can be little doubt as to Gevaert's understanding of the term; he has doubled Gluck's first violin part with a piccolo-flute (there is no indication of such an instrument in the first French edition of Gluck's score), evidently intending an allusion to the Provençal tambourin and galoubet. The tambourin is simply a drum—presumably of the toy shop, rub-a-dub order—and is always used in Provence in connection with the galoubet, a shrill little rudimentary flageolet. On Friday afternoon, I could hear no piccolo-flute, and so suppose that Mr. Gericke preferred to stick to Gluck's original score; still it seems to me that a careful man like Gevaert must have had some authority for his version.

I must have heard Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" when it was given in the season of 1891-92 under Mr. Nikisch; but I had forgotten all about it, and on Friday afternoon it came to me as quite new. It shows Tchaikovsky in his most frenetic vein; anything approaching the desperate madness of that second theme I have not heard, even from him. Upon the whole, it is a hard work to size up at a first hearing. Some few points struck me particularly. The infinite beauty of instrumental coloring in most of the Lento introduction; then the genuinely poetic effect of the twelve midnight strokes on the stopped horn. The thing looks naively puerile in the score; you take it to be a mere piece of rather childish realism. But the mysterious unearthly beauty of the harmonies in the wood-wind which Tchaikovsky weaves around those twelve clock-strokes throws the poetic significance of the situation into such relief that you become quite unconscious of the mere realism in it, you even forget to count the strokes. Most impressive of all was the sudden appearance of that march-like theme in the brass, against rolls on the snare-drum; there was something strangely dramatic about it, it made you think of the trumpets and drums in the "Agnus Dei" of Beethoven's Missa Solemnis; it was hard to believe that anything at a brisk tempo could sound so solemn. But for the rest, this "Hamlet" is considerably enigmatic to me. I have my suspicions that the performance was to a great extent at fault. Such mad music should not be played too sanely; it is like tremendous profane swearing, uttered with a Charles Grandison voice and manner. Tchaikovsky's desperation needs to be desperately done; the performance seemed to me illogically restrained. Not that I would ever advocate a "rough" performance of anything; I like to have things sound well. Save in the humorous vein, music that fails of its effect unless it is uncouthly played oversteps musical bounds. But there is no necessary connection between technical finish and lack of emotional intensity; the most desperate fierceness of expression is quite compatible with a good tone and finished ensemble. Now it seems quite evident to me that this Tchaikovsky music, thoroughly unclassical as it is in style and construction, can really have nothing to do with the classical spirit of performance. It is utterly unreserved, and should be unreservedly played.

Eugène Ysaye taught us a valuable lesson about the modern French chamber-music, in the style in which he and his colleagues played concerted things by César Franck and others. After hearing his performances of such things, we found that they differed from all we had known of concerted chamber-music by great German masters in one very essential point—a quartet by Franck, for pianoforte and strings, is not so much a combination of mutually dependent parts, all working helpfully together with a common aim, as it is a collocation of four solo parts, each one of which tries its best to speak for itself. Here virtuosity of individual expression its more important than mutually helpful ensemble.

I certainly would not claim that the difference between Tchaikovsky's orchestral music and that of the German classical schools was the same in kind as the difference between the modern French and the older German chamber-music. But the difference is fully as marked in degree; and it seems to me logical and right, in playing Tchaikovsky, to throw overboard everything (save technical perfection alone) that rightly applied to the performance of the German orchestral classics. When Tchaikovsky says "damn!" let him say it with a will, so that people may know that he is swearing; don't make it sound like "d-mn!"

If the performance of "Hamlet" left something to be desired, that of Schumann's D minor symphony left nothing. It was superb, exhaustive, at every point. It made the symphony sound actually as though Schumann had been a master of orchestration; the first violins sounded as brilliant as if Berlioz had written the part! Tempi and spirit were alike admirable, the execution was flawless.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho," opus 44; Lalo, symphonic espagnole, for violin; Paine, ballet-music from the opera "Azara," three Moorish dances (MS., first time); Beethoven, symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92. Mr. T. Adamowski will be the solo violinist.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7, 1900.

Leonora Jackson.

Tour with Boston Symphony Orchestra—Brilliant Ovations at Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Fall River and Providence.

FOR the first time in the history of music in America, an American violinist has been soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra on one of its tours. Upon Leonora Jackson, a girl of twenty years, this distinction has been conferred. It is a well-known fact that she has played with all the greatest orchestral organizations of Europe. After she returned to her native country she made her début with the New York Philharmonic Society; then she played with the Chicago, Cincinnati and Pittsburg Symphony orchestras, and now, as a crowning achievement, Miss Jackson has just appeared eight times with Mr. Gericke's forces—twice in Boston, and on their last tournée, once each in New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Fall River and Providence. It is in itself a guarantee of the eminence of an artist, of the superiority of his or her accomplishment and talent, that the conductor of this superb orchestral organization indorses the performance of any player to the extent of eight engagements.

And so it may be accepted without hesitation that the flattering foreign press notices which heralded Leonora Jackson's coming, her cordial welcome by both press and public on her arrival in her native country, and the ovations that are meeting her everywhere she plays are all deserved, a just appreciation of the extraordinary gifts of this graceful, beautiful, modest young American girl.

Excerpts of some of the press notices of Miss Jackson's tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra follow:

At Boston with Boston Symphony.

Miss Leonora Jackson proved herself a thorough artist in many directions. Pure intonation, clear harmonics, admirable surety and elegance of style characterized her work. She was recalled again and again, given floral tributes, and in every way received a welcome that was memorable.—Louis C. Elson, in Boston Daily Advertiser, February 19, 1900.

Miss Jackson is a young artist of decided merit. Her style is intelligently artistic. Both her reading and her performance of the Concerto were steadily meritorious. She was applauded with extreme enthusiasm and recalled some four or five times.—Ben Woolf, in Boston Herald, February 18, 1900.

What a wonderful bow arm she has. The searching beauty of her tone, the purity of her sentiment, her earnest concentration and fine musical instinct are of a very rare sort. She plays with authority.—W. F. Apthorp, in Boston Evening Transcript, February 19, 1900.

After a year or two of bombardment by printed encomiums from abroad concerning the talent and genius of Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, we have heard her play, and, wonder of wonders, the advance puffery was not so very much overdone. She plays with remarkable ease and authority, and she is, by all odds, the most promising young woman player since Camilla Urso. —Wilber D. Quint, in Boston Traveler, February 19, 1900.

At New York with Boston Symphony.

She is a violinist of significant achievement. The audience applauded her with great enthusiasm.—New York Sun, February 23, 1900.

Leonora Jackson, who made her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, was recalled nine times after playing Mendelssohn's Concerto.—New York Press, February 23, 1900.

The soloist was Miss Leonora Jackson, violinist, whose accomplished art has already won her a welcome here. She played in a masterly style, revealing a delicious and almost virile power.—New York Herald, February 23, 1900.

At Philadelphia with Boston Symphony.

Miss Leonora Jackson chose as the medium of her introduction the Mendelssohn Concerto, and at once created a most favorable impression. Miss Jackson has none of the vices and all the virtues that a violinist not long turned twenty could ask for. She has amazing technic, her intonation is faultless; she plays with strength and freedom and an incisiveness that commands admiration. She produces a full, round tone, and with years and the confidence they will bring will come a greater depth of feeling.

It is evident that she has been thoroughly well schooled and is following the scholarly path that cannot fail to realize the greatest and best kind of success—the path that is straightforward and free from trickery and chicanery. To her other merits she adds a dignity and an authority of manner that appeal agreeably to the audience and command respect as well as admiration.—Philadelphia Ledger, February 26, 1900.

The soloist was that much heralded violinist, Miss Leonora Jackson, of whom it must be said that it would have been wonderful and wholly unprecedented had she fully realized the expectations which her managers have raised. Yet she did not fall far short of doing so. Her execution is facile, her intonation true and her tone agreeable. She was enthusiastically applauded and pressed hard for an encore. —Philadelphia Inquirer, February 25, 1900

Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto, a cheval de bataille of all violinists, and established her claim as a thoroughly good artist. She has a good, broad tone, her bowing is excellent and her intonation unimpeachable She was recalled again and again. —Philadelphia Record, February 25, 1900.

At Baltimore with Boston Symphony.

Miss Jackson has accomplished the rare feat of living up to the advance notices, and the much advertised triumphs of the Old World have won their counterpart in the New.

Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto with the ease of a master. The feeling was that here was a woman that asks no odds of any man, but claimed her place as an artist, regardless of sex.—Baltimore American, February 21, 1900

In the entire gamut of female violinists, including Powell, Lady Hallé, Tua, Urso, there is hardly one in which can be found the combination of virtuosa qualities displayed by Miss Jackson.

From the first stroke of her bow Miss Jackson had her audience won, and her work throughout, for a woman, was something in the nature of a revelation—Baltimore Morning Her[illegible], February 21, 1900.

At Brooklyn with Boston Symphony.

Leonora Jackson does more than promise remarkably. She plays with rare ability and understanding. Possibly no violinist of her years—which are obviously few—has exhibited a better technic. She plays with an evenness and breadth that are surprising when one notes her slender, girlish physique. What is also to the purpose, she plays with knowledge and sentiment.—Brooklyn Eagle, February 24, 1900.

It may be said at once that Miss Jackson convinced her hearers that she has genuine artistic capacity. She is gifted with an agreeable personality, and by her presence alone gains the good will of her audience. Her art is refined and fluent, and her absorbing intensity gives to her playing a unique charm.—Brooklyn Times, February 24, 1900.

Brooklynites seemed ready to join the throng of her admirers. Miss Jackson exhibited several commendable qualifications for a high place in her art. Her excellent bowing is one of her strongest points, while her technic is developed to a praiseworthy degree. She was recalled many times.—Brooklyn Citizen, February 24, 1900.

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, March 4, 1900.

MR. GERICKE and his band of artists gave Baltimore a memorable treat Tuesday evening, February 20, at the fourth Boston Symphony concert of the season. The program was superbly played.

It comprised Cherubin's Overture to "Anacreon," Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and the third and fifth movements from Moszkowski's Suite in F major. The "Anacreon" overture was inimitably performed. It is a privilege to hear the magnificent string choir of this orchestra in so advantageous a composition.

Leonora Jackson, the soloist, contributed very largely to the success of the concert. Her playing had not been overrated. She dared much in selecting a concerto in which one has heard all the great violinists, but her performance more than justified her daring. Her tone is pure and beautifully colored, her technic fluent, her temperament musical and sympathetic.

The Moszkowski movements were exquisitely played and brought to a close the last but one of this season's concerts.

* * *

THE new Music Hall is nearing shape very rapidly and it is stated that it will positively be ready for occupancy June 1 of this year. Nothwithstanding the fact that everyone will welcome the new structure with its comfort and elegance, the old historic Music Hall of the present and of the past will never be forgotten and to many the march of civilization and progression will bring sorrow, as commerce will work into the spot now almost holy through ages and memories. Had Music Hall lived in this capacity until 1902 it would have served art (and several other things incidentally) for fifty years.

Prior to the building of Music Hall of the present, pleasure seekers took their enjoyment in Tremont Temple (which was burned later and rebuilt about 1858), Melodian Hall, Cochituate, Masonic Temple, Odeon, later the Boston Theatre. Chickering Hall was built in the same year.

The first action taken towards the erection of Music Hall was at a meeting of the Council of Advice of the Boston Musical Fund Society, held at their rooms in the old Tremont Temple, September 27, 1850. Dr. Charles G. Putnam was in the chair and J. Francis Kimball was secretary. A committee of five, which was increased to nine, was appointed. The committee was: J. B. Upham, C. C. Perkins, Samuel Eliot, Jonas Chickering, H. T. Parker, J. Lodge, H. W. Pickering, T. Corner and J. M. Bell. After hard and earnest work the committee made a report and requested to be discharged upon the ground that although the time was ripe to act they could not raise sufficient interest and funds. After this vigorous efforts were made by some gentlemen to erect a concert room that might also serve as an opera house. This project failed also.

The plan to erect Boston Music Hall was again proposed at the annual supper of the Harvard Musical Association, January, 1851. A committee was drafted at once to look into a general plan, a report upon which was made within four weeks. Six localities were presented; four were at once rejected, the choice resting between the Bumstead estate and the Apthorp estate on Tremont street, in the rear of Boylston. It is needless to say that the former was selected, as Music Hall now stands to attest.

The first anouncement which told of the nearing completion of Music Hall appeared in Dwight's Journal of Music, June 12, 1852, stating that Music Hall, which would seat 3,000 people, and the lecture room, seating 800, would be available after November 15, for religious societies and for the purpose of regular worship on Sundays, as well as for musical purposes.

The first society arranging for concerts in the new hall was the Germania Musical Society, which engaged the hall for ten evening concerts, commencing with the first Saturday after the opening of the hall; also for every Wednesday afternoon during the winter. Following the engagement by this society were the engagements of Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society for every Sunday evening for five years, the Musical Fund Society for their concerts, the Mercantile Library Association for thirty evenings, and to Theodore Parker's religious society for the Sunday forenoons. Lewis Jones, who had charge of Armory Hall, was appointed superintendent of the new hall at this time.

The opening of the hall, November 20, was under the most brilliant auspices. The tickets, placed at $2, were to form the fund for the supply of a first-class organ, after the expenses of the concert, or, rather festival, had been paid. The musical societies taking part were: The Handel and Haydn, the Musical Education, the Musical Fund, the Germania Serenade Band, and the Germania Liederafel. The soloists were: Madame Alboni, Signor Sangiovanni, Signor Rovere and Signor Arditi. The conductor was G. J. Webb; organist, F. F. Muller, and conductor of orchestra, August Fries. The program was enormous, probably nothing more prodigious in compilation has ever been given since.

At the opening concert there were about 2,500 people assembled, and $1,000 was made for the organ fund.

The next night the "Stabat Mater," preceded by a sacred concert, was given by the Handel and Haydn Society and Mme. Henrietta Sontag, in which they were assisted by Mlle. Caroline Loehmann, Signori Badiali, Pozzolini, Rocco and the Germania Society, conductor Carl Eckert and leader Carl Bergman.

The music hall seal was drawn by Miss Jane M. Clarke and the motto, "Coelo venit aurea dextro" was furnished by Rev. Theodore Parker. George Snell was the architect, and his plans were taken to Europe to make sure that everything that could be done to make the new hall successful should be accomplished. Those who were identified with the carrying of the scheme in addition to the nine names first mentioned were George Derby, R. E. Apthorp, J. S. Dwight, Hillard and Jennison. For the project $100,000 was raised in sixty days. The managers of the hall after Lewis Jones were A. P. Peck, Charles A. Ellis and Louis H. Mudgett, who will be the first manager of the new hall.

The great organ of Music Hall, which was placed there about 1861 or 1862, has had quite a career itself. It was opened by George W. Morgan, J. K. Paine, Dr. J. H. Wilcox (son-in-law of Jonas Chickering) and Eugene Thayer—in fact, all organists of note were invited and many were present. During the eighties the organ was sold to the New England Conservatory, and was stored away in a shed for some years until it was sold to Edward Searles for a song.

The organ has never been set up, but remains boxed up in the cars in which it was transported to Methuen, Mass.

* * *

The Boston Symphony was welcome after its guesting tour. The program was given without soloist, and in the face of the magnificence of the Tschaikowsky number a soloist could have added nothing. The composition was given with a broad sweep, and in fire and coloring was rich and full. The "Leonore" No. 1 Overture was in superb contrast, and the interesting program was:

Overture to Leonore..Beethoven
Ballet Suite, No. 2..Gluck
  Air, moderato non lento; Danse des Esclaves, allegro; Tambourin, presto; from Iphigénie en Aulide.
  Gavotte, moderato; from Armide and Orphée; Grande Chaconne, allegro moderato; from Iphigénie en Aulide.
  (Put together by F. A. Gevaert.)
Phantasie overture, Hamlet, op. 67........................Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120........................Schumann

* * *

STON JOURNAL—FRIDAY, MARCH 9, 19

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

T. ADAMOWSKI.

Boston's popular and talented violinist.

ANOTHER OF THE JOURNAL'S SERIES OF PORTRAITS.

[81]

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 7, 1900.

Leonora Jackson.

Tour with Boston Symphony Orchestra—Brilliant Ovations at Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Fall River and Providence.

FOR the first time in the history of music in America, an American violinist has been soloist for the Boston Symphony Orchestra on one of its tours. Upon Leonora Jackson, a girl of twenty years, this distinction has been conferred. It is a well-known fact that she has played with all the greatest orchestral organizations of Europe. After she returned to her native country she made her début with the New York Philharmonic Society; then she played with the Chicago, Cincinnati and Pittsburg Symphony orchestras, and now, as a crowning achievement, Miss Jackson has just appeared eight times with Mr. Gericke's forces—twice in Boston, and on their last tournée, once each in New York, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Fall River and Providence. It is in itself a guarantee of the eminence of an artist, of the superiority of his or her accomplishment and talent, that the conductor of this superb orchestral organization indorses the performance of any player to the extent of eight engagements.

And so it may be accepted without hesitation that the flattering foreign press notices which heralded Leonora Jackson's coming, her cordial welcome by both press and public on her arrival in her native country, and the ovations that are meeting her everywhere she plays are all deserved, a just appreciation of the extraordinary gifts of this graceful, beautiful, modest young American girl.

Excerpts of some of the press notices of Miss Jackson's tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra follow:

At Boston with Boston Symphony.

Miss Leonora Jackson proved herself a thorough artist in many directions. Pure intonation, clear harmonics, admirable surety and elegance of style characterized her work. She was recalled again and again, given floral tributes, and in every way received a welcome that was memorable.—Louis C. Elson, in Boston Daily Advertiser, February 19, 1900.

Miss Jackson is a young artist of decided merit. Her style is intelligently artistic. Both her reading and her performance of the Concerto were steadily meritorious. She was applauded with extreme enthusiasm and recalled some four or five times.—Ben Woolf, in Boston Herald, February 18, 1900.

What a wonderful bow arm she has. The searching beauty of her tone, the purity of her sentiment, her earnest concentration and fine musical instinct are of a very rare sort. She plays with authority.—W. F. Apthorp, in Boston Evening Transcript, February 19, 1900.

After a year or two of bombardment by printed encomiums from abroad concerning the talent and genius of Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, we have heard her play, and, wonder of wonders, the advance puffery was not so very much overdone. She plays with remarkable ease and authority, and she is, by all odds, the most promising young woman player since Camilla Urso. —Wilber D. Quint, in Boston Traveler, February 19, 1900.

At New York with Boston Symphony.

She is a violinist of significant achievement. The audience applauded her with great enthusiasm.—New York Sun, February 23, 1900.

Leonora Jackson, who made her first appearance here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall, was recalled nine times after playing Mendelssohn's Concerto.—New York Press, February 23, 1900.

The soloist was Miss Leonora Jackson, violinist, whose accomplished art has already won her a welcome here. She played in a masterly style, revealing a delicious and almost virile power.—New York Herald, February 23, 1900.

At Philadelphia with Boston Symphony.

Miss Leonora Jackson chose as the medium of her introduction the Mendelssohn Concerto, and at once created a most favorable impression. Miss Jackson has none of the vices and all the virtues that a violinist not long turned twenty could ask for. She has amazing technic, her intonation is faultless; she plays with strength and freedom and an incisiveness that commands admiration. She produces a full, round tone, and with years and the confidence they will bring will come a greater depth of feeling.

It is evident that she has been thoroughly well schooled and is following the scholarly path that cannot fail to realize the greatest and best kind of success—the path that is straightforward and free from trickery and chicanery. To her other merits she adds a dignity and an authority of manner that appeal agreeably to the audience and command respect as well as admiration.—Philadelphia Ledger, February 26, 1900.

The soloist was that much heralded violinist, Miss Leonora Jackson, of whom it must be said that it would have been wonderful and wholly unprecedented had she fully realized the expectations which her managers have raised. Yet she did not fall far short of doing so. Her execution is facile, her intonation true and her tone agreeable. She was enthusiastically applauded and pressed hard for an encore. —Philadelphia Inquirer, February 25, 1900

Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto, a cheval de bataille of all violinists, and established her claim as a thoroughly good artist. She has a good, broad tone, her bowing is excellent and her intonation unimpeachable She was recalled again and again. —Philadelphia Record, February 25, 1900.

At Baltimore with Boston Symphony.

Miss Jackson has accomplished the rare feat of living up to the advance notices, and the much advertised triumphs of the Old World have won their counterpart in the New.

Miss Jackson played the Mendelssohn Concerto with the ease of a master. The feeling was that here was a woman that asks no odds of any man, but claimed her place as an artist, regardless of sex.—Baltimore American, February 21, 1900

In the entire gamut of female violinists, including Powell, Lady Hallé, Tua, Urso, there is hardly one in which can be found the combination of virtuosa qualities displayed by Miss Jackson.

From the first stroke of her bow Miss Jackson had her audience won, and her work throughout, for a woman, was something in the nature of a revelation—Baltimore Morning Herald, February 21, 1900.

At Brooklyn with Boston Symphony.

Leonora Jackson does more than promise remarkably. She plays with rare ability and understanding. Possibly no violinist of her years—which are obviously few—has exhibited a better technic. She plays with an evenness and breadth that are surprising when one notes her slender, girlish physique. What is also to the purpose, she plays with knowledge and sentiment.—Brooklyn Eagle, February 24, 1900.

It may be said at once that Miss Jackson convinced her hearers that she has genuine artistic capacity. She is gifted with an agreeable personality, and by her presence alone gains the good will of her audience. Her art is refined and fluent, and her absorbing intensity gives to her playing a unique charm.—Brooklyn Times, February 24, 1900.

Brooklynites seemed ready to join the throng of her admirers. Miss Jackson exhibited several commendable qualifications for a high place in her art. Her excellent bowing is one of her strongest points, while her technic is developed to a praiseworthy degree. She was recalled many times.—Brooklyn Citizen, February 24, 1900.

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, March 4, 1900.

MR. GERICKE and his band of artists gave Baltimore a memorable treat Tuesday evening, February 20, at the fourth Boston Symphony concert of the season. The program was superbly played.

It comprised Cherubin's Overture to "Anacreon," Mendelssohn's Concerto for violin, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and the third and fifth movements from Moszkowski's Suite in F major. The "Anacreon" overture was inimitably performed. It is a privilege to hear the magnificent string choir of this orchestra in so advantageous a composition.

Leonora Jackson, the soloist, contributed very largely to the success of the concert. Her playing had not been overrated. She dared much in selecting a concerto in which one has heard all the great violinists, but her performance more than justified her daring. Her tone is pure and beautifully colored, her technic fluent, her temperament musical and sympathetic.

The Moszkowski movements were exquisitely played and brought to a close the last but one of this season's concerts.

* * *

THE new Music Hall is nearing shape very rapidly and it is stated that it will positively be ready for occupancy June 1 of this year. Nothwithstanding the fact that everyone will welcome the new structure with its comfort and elegance, the old historic Music Hall of the present and of the past will never be forgotten and to many the march of civilization and progression will bring sorrow, as commerce will work into the spot now almost holy through ages and memories. Had Music Hall lived in this capacity until 1902 it would have served art (and several other things incidentally) for fifty years.

Prior to the building of Music Hall of the present, pleasure seekers took their enjoyment in Tremont Temple (which was burned later and rebuilt about 1858), Melodian Hall, Cochituate, Masonic Temple, Odeon, later the Boston Theatre. Chickering Hall was built in the same year.

The first action taken towards the erection of Music Hall was at a meeting of the Council of Advice of the Boston Musical Fund Society, held at their rooms in the old Tremont Temple, September 27, 1850. Dr. Charles G. Putnam was in the chair and J. Francis Kimball was secretary. A committee of five, which was increased to nine, was appointed. The committee was: J. B. Upham, C. C. Perkins, Samuel Eliot, Jonas Chickering, H. T. Parker, J. Lodge, H. W. Pickering, T. Corner and J. M. Bell. After hard and earnest work the committee made a report and requested to be discharged upon the ground that although the time was ripe to act they could not raise sufficient interest and funds. After this vigorous efforts were made by some gentlemen to erect a concert room that might also serve as an opera house. This project failed also.

The plan to erect Boston Music Hall was again proposed at the annual supper of the Harvard Musical Association, January, 1851. A committee was drafted at once to look into a general plan, a report upon which was made within four weeks. Six localities were presented; four were at once rejected, the choice resting between the Bumstead estate and the Apthorp estate on Tremont street, in the rear of Boylston. It is needless to say that the former was selected, as Music Hall now stands to attest.

The first anouncement which told of the nearing completion of Music Hall appeared in Dwight's Journal of Music, June 12, 1852, stating that Music Hall, which would seat 3,000 people, and the lecture room, seating 800, would be available after November 15, for religious societies and for the purpose of regular worship on Sundays, as well as for musical purposes.

The first society arranging for concerts in the new hall was the Germania Musical Society, which engaged the hall for ten evening concerts, commencing with the first Saturday after the opening of the hall; also for every Wednesday afternoon during the winter. Following the engagement by this society were the engagements of Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society for every Sunday evening for five years, the Musical Fund Society for their concerts, the Mercantile Library Association for thirty evenings, and to Theodore Parker's religious society for the Sunday forenoons. Lewis Jones, who had charge of Armory Hall, was appointed superintendent of the new hall at this time.

The opening of the hall, November 20, was under the most brilliant auspices. The tickets, placed at $2, were to form the fund for the supply of a first-class organ, after the expenses of the concert, or, rather festival, had been paid. The musical societies taking part were: The Handel and Haydn, the Musical Education, the Musical Fund, the Germania Serenade Band, and the Germania Liedertafel. The soloists were: Madame Alboni, Signor Sangiovanni, Signor Rovere and Signor Arditi. The conductor was G. J. Webb; organist, F. F. Muller, and conductor of orchestra, August Fries. The program was enormous, probably nothing more prodigious in compilation has ever been given since.

At the opening concert there were about 2,500 people assembled, and $1,000 was made for the organ fund.

The next night the "Stabat Mater," preceded by a sacred concert, was given by the Handel and Haydn Society and Mme. Henrietta Sontag, in which they were assisted by Mlle. Caroline Loehmann, Signori Badiali, Pozzolini, Rocco and the Germania Society, conductor Carl Eckert and leader Carl Bergman.

The music hall seal was drawn by Miss Jane M. Clarke and the motto, "Coelo venit aurea dextro" was furnished by Rev. Theodore Parker. George Snell was the architect, and his plans were taken to Europe to make sure that everything that could be done to make the new hall successful should be accomplished. Those who were identified with the carrying of the scheme in addition to the nine names first mentioned were George Derby, R. E. Apthorp, J. S. Dwight, Hillard and Jennison. For the project $100,000 was raised in sixty days. The managers of the hall after Lewis Jones were A. P. Peck, Charles A. Ellis and Louis H. Mudgett, who will be the first manager of the new hall.

The great organ of Music Hall, which was placed there about 1861 or 1862, has had quite a career itself. It was opened by George W. Morgan, J. K. Paine, Dr. J. H. Wilcox (son-in-law of Jonas Chickering) and Eugene Thayer—in fact, all organists of note were invited and many were present. During the eighties the organ was sold to the New England Conservatory, and was stored away in a shed for some years until it was sold to Edward Searles for a song.

The organ has never been set up, but remains boxed up in the cars in which it was transported to Methuen, Mass.

* * *

The Boston Symphony was welcome after its guesting tour. The program was given without soloist, and in the face of the magnificence of the Tschaikowsky number a soloist could have added nothing. The composition was given with a broad sweep, and in fire and coloring was rich and full. The "Leonore" No. 1 Overture was in superb contrast, and the interesting program was:

Overture to Leonore	Beethoven
Ballet Suite, No. 2	Gluck
Air, moderato non lento; Danse des Esclaves, allegro; Tambourin, presto; from Iphigénie en Aulide. Gavotte, moderato; from Armide and Orphée; Grande Chaconne, allegro moderato; from Iphigénie en Aulide. (Put together by F. A. Gevaert.)
Phantasie overture, Hamlet, op. 67	Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120	Schumann

* * *

STON JOURNAL—FRIDAY, MARCH 9, 19

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

T. ADAMOWSKI.

Boston's popular and talented violinist.

ANOTHER OF THE JOURNAL'S SERIES OF PORTRAITS.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL—Mornings, $6.00 per annum; $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), 16 Pages, $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fine Playing by Leonora Jackson, Violin Virtuoso.

The fifth concert of the Symphony series was given last evening in Infantry Hall before an audience somewhat larger than usual. Curiosity to hear Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, of whom so much has been heard recently, was undoubtedly a factor in increasing the attendance. The orchestra manifested a disposition not to be outdone by the brilliant young solo player, and gave a finished and forceful rendering to the solid programme of classical music. It was Germany's night, the numbers being selected from four of the greatest composers of that nationality. The order of the programme was as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 1, Op. 138.... ....Ludwig van Beethoven
Concerto for violin in E minor, Op. 64.... ....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
 I. Allegro molto appassionato (E minor)
 II. Andante (C major)
 III. Allegretto non troppo (E minor)
  Allegro molto vivace (E major)
Entr'acte, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of the Master Singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Act III..... ....Richard Wagner
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120.... ....Robert Schumann
 I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor)
  Lebhaft (D minor)
 II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A minor)
 III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor)
  Trio: (B-flat major)
 IV. Langsam (D minor)
  Lebhaft (D major)

It would be difficult to present a more interesting programme than this, or one more thoroughly representative of the contributions to musical art of the century just closing. Unless, indeed, objection be made to the inclusion of Richard Wagner among "representative" composers of the 19th century. True, he departed widely from the forms of expression utilized by others, but he was hardly more of an iconoclast in his time than was Beethoven at an earlier period. Nor can it be truly said that his music bears the stamp of individuality any more strongly marked than does the work of Schumann or Mendelssohn. It matters not which of this immortal group be crowned King by contemporary suffrage, or upon whom the verdict of time may bestow the undisputed title of master. They are great names, one and all, and without the products of their genius, without their example, their influence, their inspiration, the art of music would be immeasurably poorer than it is to-day.

Beethoven's superb overture, with which the concert was opened, contains some of his most daring departures from conventionality. There are times when the hearer, if it were his first introduction to the work and the author's name were not upon the programme, might easily fancy that he was listening to a composition by one of the most "modern" of musicians. The music is based largely upon themes drawn from the opera, but the treatment is most original, full of variety and leading to a stunning climax. It was played with superb vigor and most satisfactory attention to every detail of nuance.

The excerpts from Wagner's "Meistersingers" were not only interesting in themselves, but furnished a pointed illustration of the important part assigned to the orchestra in the operas of the Baireuth master. With him the orchestra is the chief delineator, never relegated to the position of humbly accompanying this singer or that. Or, more frequently perhaps, solo voices, chorus and instruments are all combined as parts of one consistent and suggestive picture. From how many operas of other composers could an effective concert number be culled by the simple process of playing from the orchestral score, the vocal parts being entirely omitted? It is safe to say, not one. Whether there be any advantage in this is beside the question. The fact is interesting in connection with Wagner's original theories as to the proper relations of music and drama. The "Meistersinger" music is charming in itself, and the beauties of the score were thoroughly exemplified by the sympathetic playing of the symphony men.

The concert closed brilliantly with Schumann's D-minor symphony, a work in which the composer packed enough of musical ideas to furnish two or three symphonies if the themes were developed and worked out as Beethoven treated his material. The work teems with variety and contrast. While as a whole the symphony is of a forceful and brilliant character, there are some peculiarly lovely bits of quiet melody, prominent among which are the brief romance and the trio of the Scherzo. Again the playing was most satisfactory and effective.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Leonora Jackson, scored a pronounced success. The young woman has received the largest amount of advance advertising that has been accorded to any artist in recent years. This would have been most dangerous were her talents mediocre. It is a pleasure to record the fact that in every way this young American violinist fulfilled expectations. Her technical equipment seems well nigh perfect. While this is nothing more than is expected nowadays of every artist, the expectation is by no means always met. Her tone is pure and of sufficient breadth, her agility remarkable, her harmonics and chord-playing of impeccable accuracy, and she has a great bow arm. To what degree she possesses the temperament necessary for the production of the highest artistic qualities did not appear, for the Mendelssohn concerto is written for the executant rather than the interpreter. [illegible] in the andante she displayed a [illegible] and musicianly spirit. Altogether her playing was delightful, and [illegible] audience fairly overwhelmed her [illegible] applause, recalling her four times [illegible] the conclusion of the number.

The sixth concert of the symphony series will be given on Wednesday evening, March 28.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT.
ESTABLISHED 1830.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 12, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Paine's "Moorish Dances."

The concert of Saturday began with the overture to "The Bartered Bride," by that Bohemian genius, Smetana. The beauty of the overture makes one wish that we might have the entire opera some day; we are receiving almost daily invoices of consecutive fifths in the newest Italian operas, why should we not hear this melodious and refined comic opera and learn the lesson that it is still possible to say something new in music without banishing all the harmonic text-books! They still hold to a good many Mozart traditions in Prague, and it is [illegible] natural to find something of the German school in Smetana, but his great patriotism, and his intense nature, forbade his becoming in any sense a copy of a German master.

Therefore we hasten to say that the work is sui generis, before we speak of its points of resemblance to the "Magic Flute" overture.

The same chattering character is in both works, the same dash, the same union of counterpoint with popular melody. The fugal exposition which forms the chief theme of the "Magic Flute" overture is here balanced by a more extended, if somewhat freer fugal treatment (rather canonic than strictly fugal) of the chief theme. The violins had the brunt of the work to do, which is equivalent to saying that it was perfectly done, for in no orchestra of the world is there such a body of first violins as we hear, almost with nonchalance, at each Saturday concert. The wild rush of the coda was inspiring. We reiterate our Oliver Twist demand; we are given Leoncavallo, Mascagni, and Puccini upon our operatic stage, let us have Smetana, Cornelius and Goetz also.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski has every reason to feel proud of his performance of the solo part of Lolo's "Spanish Symphony" at this concert. He was in his best form and played with a brilliancy and security that compels the highest praise. The work itself came as a welcome change from the Beethoven-Brahms-Mendelssohn round of violin concertos even if it does not stand as high as any of them. Lalo has managed to individualize his solo instrument sufficiently to keep it from merging in the orchestral mass, and the pizzicato background of the second movement, the discreet accompaniment of the slow movement and the carillon-like figure of the orchestra in the finale (a Spanish version of "Three Blind Mice") form good foils to the solo passages.

The constant caprice and syncopation of the Scherzo, the tenderness of the Andante, and the broad work upon the G string in the finale, were especially noticeable points of a commendable interpretation. The work does not permit the soloist to hide his light under a bushel; the difficulties are paraded much as Rossini or Donizetti would dispity vocal difficulties in an aria di bravura, and, if difficulty is sometimes attained at the expense of beauty, it is only an instance of virtuosity being its own reward.

Prof. John K. Paine is always sure of a friendly hearing when he comes before our public with a new work. In these days, when it is almost impossible to throw a stone, in Boston or New York, without hitting an American composer, one can think back upon the time when all that was permanent in native musical creation came from this modest gentleman. There was bound to be much interest in the first hearing of a few fragments from his new opera of "Azara". As the plot of this opera runs along the lines of the old Trouvere theme of "Aucassin and Nicollette" (a 13th century tale, and the purest of mediaeval love stories) and as this subject takes us into Saracenic countries, it was natural to find good opportunities for Oriental music in the opera. Three Moorish dances were the selections given at this concert. They were scarcely to be considered as examples of the lightest type of ballet-music, for in this opera the ballet work forms an integral part of the subject and is not an extraneous and meretricious display, as in "The Huguenots" or "Faust". One could not help comparing the numbers with Rubinstein's "Feramors" music, a similar Oriental theme. Mr. Paine has not achieved the sensuous languor of this latter ballet, but he has none the less caught up the spirit of the East in good degree and succeeded in finding the common ground where classicist and melody-seeker can meet.

The color of the English horn is perhaps a trifle sombre for the eastern subject, but the oboe gave the true local color to some of the melodies. That the composer would be contented with mere melodies was not to be expected, and there was an interesting degree of development and figure treatment in some of the numbers, even the kettledrum being ingeniously used in this work. Many clever bits of syncopation appeared and, where a lesser composer would have fallen into a conventional rut, Mr. Paine has attained a good degree of originality. Of course the scenic adjuncts will greatly heighten the musical effect, and we hope that we may have the opportunity of judging of the work with its proper ensemble in the near future. The public became enthusiastic over the dances and the composer was called to the stage to acknowledge the continued plaudits.

After these dances came the most dancelike of Beethoven's symphonies—the seventh. It received a splendid interpretation with just the conservatism which we find so admirable in Mr. Gericke's Beethoven readings.

To us the seventh symphony is the most attractive of the nine, for it does not attempt the impossible (or at least the impracticable) as the ninth does, it is not unequal, going from grandeur to lightness as the "Heroic" does, and it combines popular melody with complex development in a manner that attracts musicians and laity a manner that attracts musicians and laity at the same time; it is the practical attainment of the "juste milieu."

It has the noblest introduction of any of the symphonies, and its transition into the chief theme, via a single note 61 times repeated, is most picturesque, spite of its [illegible] [illegible] only [illegible] introduction [illegible] of the [illegible], the end of the [illegible] movement, and especially in the coda of the finale. It is also the most remarkable instance of rhythmic treatment extant, for the entire first movement is founded on a dactyl twice repeated, and the glorious Allegretto (the gem of the work) is only an apotheosis of a dactyl and a spondee (or trochee) in constant alternation. And with what persistency Beethoven here uses the device of dialogue between woodwind and strings! The conversation between these seems never-ending, yet never becomes tiresome!

Mr. Gericke rather insisted upon the "Allegretto" in the second movement. We doubt whether Beethoven fully expressed him self with this tempo-mark. He certainly vacillated between this and slower marks, and changed his ideas repeatedly about it. We fancy that Berlioz's idea that brooding was the chief characteristic of the movement is the true one; but, in avoiding the funereal character which Beethoven feared might come upon the heels of an "Andante" mark, he did not quite desire a resolute or a quick movement. If Mr. Gericke, however, gave a trifle too much of firmness to the movement it is certainly a failing that leans to virtue's side. The virility of the finale was inspiring and the power of the mighty bass reiterations was undeniable.

It is perhaps well that the public should take such a tonal tonic for at the next concert Zarathustra is to speak through his mortal mouthpiece—Richard Strauss.

Louis C. Elson.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
March ESTABLISHED 1813 10

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the eighteenth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Overture, "The Bartered Bride,".... Smetana
Spanish symphony, D minor, op. 21. Lalo
Ballet music from opera "Azara,".. J. K. Paine
Symphony No. 7, A major, op. 92.. Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

Mr. Adamowski received a very hearty greeting on his appearance as soloist, and he played with his usual care and finish. He is a most conscientious artist, and he entered into the spirit of the work he interpreted. He was at his best in the third and fourth movements, and in these he aroused his audience into enthusiasm. Mr. Paine's three Moorish dances from his opera of "Azara" were a pleasant surprise, especially the first, the allegretto animato, which was graceful, vivacious and tuneful. The orchestra of all was unusually elaborate, but in two of the movements or dances seemed to overweight the subject matter and to deprive them of their dramatic interest. This, however, is simply from the stage point of view. The last movement is the least interesting and the least satisfying; the melody is not of a high character, and despite the richness of the orchestration gives more than one hint of the commonplace. Throughout, however, the master musician was in full evidence, and Mr. Paine easily demonstrated, if demonstration were needed, that he stands easily first among native composers; not only in knowledge and talents, but in the capacity to use these to their greatest advantage. His work was greeted with the heartiest applause, and it was read by Mr. Gerricke with rare spirit and sympathy. The Smetana overture was also read and played in the most delightful manner.

The program for the next concert is: Mozart's Symphony, C major; Beethoven's Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, G major; Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; and Weber's overture, "Oberon." The soloist will be Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Association Hall, assisted by Mme. Szumowska and Mr Max Zach. The programme is: Grieg's Quartet in G minor, op. 27; Faure's Sonata, A major for piano and violin and Brahm's quintet for two violins; two violas and violoncello, op. 88.

On Wednesday evening, March 28, the Roman Festival Mass and the Easter [illegible] by Signor

---

[illegible] 1900

The Next Symphony Soloist.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who is to be soloist at the next Symphony Concert, was born in Pressbury about twenty-two years ago. His father, a professor in the gymnasium (high school), was also an excellent musician, who, besides giving his son music lessons, refused to allow him to play in public, as a "boy prodigy," but made him take a course of study at the gymnasium. While at work there, Dohnanyi studied music under Carl Forstner, and later, under Koessler and Thoman. He completed his pianoforte study, however, under Eugen d'Albert.

In the season of '95-96 Dohnanyi played twice in Vienna, giving, with a violinist, concerts of piano and violin sonatas. In the winter of 1897 he gave two recitals, and on the 9th of January, 1898, he played the Beethoven G major concerto with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, under Hans Richter. On all these occasions he was well, if not enthusiastically, received and criticised. The following June, however, he played at one of Richter's Philharmonic concerts in London, and gave some recitals, with rather more decided success.

In the spring of 1898 Herr Ludwig Bösendorfer, the great piano maker, offered a prize, in memory of Hans von Bülow, for the best pianoforte concerto, the competition to be open to composers of all lands; the judges were Julius Epstein, Mr. Gericke, Alfred Grünfeld, Leschetizky and Rosenthal. Without much discussion they awarded the first prize to Ernst von Dohnanyi, who played his concerto the following winter in Vienna, winning more praise than he had in any of his previous appearances.

Dohnanyi gives, or rather did give, two years ago, the impression of being a player of good solid technique and of excellently trained musical ability, rather than a player of brilliant technique, or of tremendous warmth or fire.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of Professor Paine's Ballet Music From the Opera "Azara"—Mr. Timothee Adamowski Plays Lalo's "Spanish Symphony."

The program of the 18th Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture to "The Sold Bride"........Smetana
Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, in D minor, Op. 21..........Lalo
Ballet-Music from the Opera "Azara;"
 Three Moorish Dances..............Paine
 (First time.)
Symphony No. 7......................Beethoven

The ballet music from Professor Paine's opera, "Azara," was played for the first time last night. It is a sad commentary on the state of opera in this country that Professor Paine is obliged to look to Germany for a production of a work to which he has devoted his talent for several years. Let us hope that a production there will bring the composer the laurel wreath that should be awarded him by his own countrymen for a new dramatic work!

The effect of this ballet music, written for the stage, would of course be enhanced by scenery, costumes, groupings and evolutions. It is planned for the opera house and it is built on broad foundations. In the concert room the first two dances are more effective than the third. The first has the more decided character. In the second, the latter section of the melody given to the English horn is not well adapted to the peculiar character of that instrument, and it is inherently commonplace. As a rule the music is sonorously scored, even when melodic invention is not marked, and it will no doubt serve its purpose in the opera. There was hearty applause and the composer left his seat and bowed his acknowledgments from the stage.

⁂

Mr. Adamowski gave much pleasure by his performance of Lalo's fascinating work. It was a performance characterized by appreciation of rhythm, wooing cantabile, warmth of tone, direct appeal, brilliance of bravura, and a liberal and spontaneous exhibition of the true virtuoso spirit.

⁂

With the exception of a slight slip or two, the performance of Smetana's overture was delightful. And here again I must deplore the wretched plight of opera in this country. Shall we never know this musical comedy except by the overture? Beethoven's 7th symphony, the one with the wondrous allegretto, brought the end of the concert.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON TIMES
March ESTABLISHED 1864 11
EDITED BY ELMER RICE

The Symphony concerts fell into line last week and made "Sapho," the initial number of their concert programme. Of course it was not the "Sapho" that has caused so much discussion in court and elsewhere of late, but it was "Sapho" pure and simple just the same, being Goldmark's overture, founded on Byron's poetic heroine who loved and sang in the isles of Greece. Mr. T. Adamowski had a solo, "Symphonic Espagnole"; J. K. Paine's Moorish dames were played for the first time and the programme concluded with Beethoven's seventh symphony.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL—Mornings, $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays). 10 Pages, $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, MARCH 8, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fine Playing by Leonora Jackson, Violin Virtuoso.

The fifth concert of the Symphony series was given last evening in Infantry Hall before an audience somewhat larger than usual. Curiosity to hear Miss Leonora Jackson, the young American violinist, of whom so much has been heard recently, was undoubtedly a factor in increasing the attendance. The orchestra manifested a disposition not to be outdone by the brilliant young solo player, and gave a finished and forceful rendering to the solid programme of classical music. It was Germany's night, the numbers being selected from four of the greatest composers of that nationality. The order of the programme was as follows:

Overture to "Leonore," No. 1, Op. 138.... ....Ludwig van Beethoven
Concerto for violin in E minor, Op. 64.... ....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
  I. Allegro molto appassionato (E minor)
  II. Andante (C major)
  III. Allegretto non troppo (E minor)
  Allegro molto vivace (E major)
Entr'acte, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of the Master Singers, and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Act III...... ....Richard Wagner
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Op. 120.... ....Robert Schumann
  I. Ziemlich langsam (D minor)
  Lebhaft (D minor)
  II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam (A minor)
  III. Scherzo: Lebhaft (D minor)
  Trio: (B-flat major)
  IV. Langsam (D minor)
  Lebhaft (D major)

It would be difficult to present a more interesting programme than this, or one more thoroughly representative of the contributions to musical art of the century just closing. Unless, indeed, objection be made to the inclusion of Richard Wagner among "representative" composers of the 19th century. True, he departed widely from the forms of expression utilized by others, but he was hardly more of an iconoclast in his time than was Beethoven at an earlier period. Nor can it be truly said that his music bears the stamp of individuality any more strongly marked than does the work of Schumann or Mendelssohn. It matters not which of this immortal group be crowned King by contemporary suffrage, or upon whom the verdict of time may bestow the undisputed title of master. They are great names, one and all, and without the products of their genius, without their example, their influence, their inspiration, the art of music would be immeasurably poorer than it is to-day.

Beethoven's superb overture, with which the concert was opened, contains some of his most daring departures from conventionality. There are times when the hearer, if it were his first introduction to the work and the author's name were not upon the programme, might easily fancy that he was listening to a composition by one of the most "modern" of musicians. The music is based largely upon themes drawn from the opera, but the treatment is most original, full of variety and leading to a stunning climax. It was played with superb vigor and most satisfactory attention to every detail of nuance.

The excerpts from Wagner's "Meistersingers" were not only interesting in themselves, but furnished a pointed illustration of the important part assigned to the orchestra in the operas of the Baireuth master. With him the orchestra is the chief delineator, never relegated to the position of humbly accompanying this singer or that. Or, more frequently perhaps, solo voices, chorus and instruments are all combined as parts of one consistent and suggestive picture. From how many operas of other composers could an effective concert number be culled by the simple process of playing from the orchestral score, the vocal parts being entirely omitted? It is safe to say, not one. Whether there be any advantage in this is beside the question. The fact is interesting in connection with Wagner's original theories as to the proper relations of music and drama. The "Meistersinger" music is charming in itself, and the beauties of the score were thoroughly exemplified by the sympathetic playing of the symphony men.

The concert closed brilliantly with Schumann's D-minor symphony, a work in which the composer packed enough of musical ideas to furnish two or three symphonies if the themes were developed and worked out as Beethoven treated his material. The work teems with variety and contrast. While as a whole the symphony is of a forceful and brilliant character, there are some peculiarly lovely bits of quiet melody, prominent among which are the brief romance and the trio of the Scherzo. Again the playing was most satisfactory and effective.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Leonora Jackson, scored a pronounced success. The young woman has received the largest amount of advance advertising that has been accorded to any artist in recent years. This would have been most dangerous were her talents mediocre. It is a pleasure to record the fact that in every way this young American violinist fulfilled expectations. Her technical equipment seems well nigh perfect. While this is nothing more than is expected nowadays of every artist, the expectation is by no means always met. Her tone is pure and of sufficient breadth, her agility remarkable, her harmonics and chord-playing of impeccable accuracy, and she has a great bow arm. To what degree she possesses the temperament necessary for the production of the highest artistic qualities did not appear, for the Mendelssohn concerto is written for executant rather than the interpreter. Yet in the andante she displayed a sympathetic and musicianly spirit. Altogether, her playing was delightful, and the audience fairly overwhelmed her with applause, recalling her four times at the conclusion of the number.

The sixth concert of the symphony series will be given on Wednesday evening, March 28.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 12, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Paine's "Moorish Dances."

The concert of Saturday began with the overture to "The Bartered Bride," by that Bohemian genius, Smetana. The beauty of the overture makes one wish that we might have the entire opera some day; we are receiving almost daily invoices of consecutive fifths in the newest Italian operas, why should we not hear this melodious and refined comic opera and learn the lesson that it is still possible to say something new in music without banishing all the harmonic text-books! They still hold to a good many Mozart traditions in Prague, and it is but natural to find something of the German school in Smetana, but his great patriotism, and his intense nature, forbade his becoming in any sense a copy of a German master.

Therefore we hasten to say that the work is sui generis, before we speak of its points of resemblance to the "Magic Flute" overture.

The same chattering character is in both works, the same dash, the same union of counterpoint with popular melody. The fugal exposition which forms the chief theme of the "Magic Flute" overture is here balanced by a more extended, if somewhat freer fugal treatment (rather canonic than strictly fugal) of the chief theme. The violins had the brunt of the work to do, which is equivalent to saying that it was perfectly done, for in no orchestra of the world is there such a body of first violins as we hear, almost with nonchalance, at each Saturday concert. The wild rush of the coda was inspiring. We reiterate our Oliver Twist demand; we are given Leoncavallo, Mascagni, and Puccini upon our operatic stage, let us have Smetana, Cornelius and Goetz also.

Mr. Timothee Adamowski has every reason to feel proud of his performance of the solo part of Lolo's "Spanish Symphony" at this concert. He was in his best form and played with a brilliancy and security that compels the highest praise. The work itself came as a welcome change from the Beethoven-Brahms-Mendelssohn round of violin concertos even if it does not stand as high as any of them. Lalo has managed to individualize his solo instrument sufficiently to keep it from merging in the orchestral mass, and the pizzicato background of the second movement, the discreet accompaniment of the slow movement and the carillon-like figure of the orchestra in the finale (a Spanish version of "Three Blind Mice") form good foils to the solo passages.

The constant caprice and syncopation of the Scherzo, the tenderness of the Andante, and the broad work upon the G string in the finale, were especially noticeable points of a commendable interpretation. The work does not permit the soloist to hide his light under a bushel; the difficulties are paraded much as Rossini or Donizetti would dispity vocal difficulties in an aria di bravura, and, if difficulty is sometimes attained at the expense of beauty, it is only an instance of virtuosity being its own reward.

Prof. John K. Paine is always sure of a friendly hearing when he comes before our public with a new work. In these days, when it is almost impossible to throw a stone, in Boston or New York, without hitting an American composer, one can think back upon the time when all that was permanent in native musical creation came from this modest gentleman. There was bound to be much interest in the first hearing of a few fragments from his new opera of "Azara". As the plot of this opera runs along the lines of the old Trouwere theme of "Aucassin and Nicollette" (a 13th century tale, and the purest of mediaeval love stories) and as this subject takes us into Saracenic countries, it was natural to find good opportunities for Oriental music in the opera. Three Moorish dances were the selections given at this concert. They were scarcely to be considered as examples of the lightest type of ballet-music, for in this opera the ballet work forms an integral part of the subject and is not an extraneous and meretricious display, as in "The Huguenots" or "Faust". One could not help comparing the numbers with Rubinstein's "Feramors" music, a similar Oriental theme. Mr. Paine has not achieved the sensuous languor of this latter ballet, but he has none the less caught up the spirit of the East in good degree and succeeded in finding the common ground where classicist and melody-seeker can meet.

The color of the English horn is perhaps a trifle sombre for the eastern subject, but the oboe gave the true local color to some of the melodies. That the composer would be contented with mere melodies was not to be expected, and there was an interesting degree of development and figure treatment in some of the numbers, even the kettledrum being ingeniously used in this work. Many clever bits of syncopation appeared and, where a lesser composer would have fallen into a conventional rut, Mr. Paine has attained a good degree of originality. Of course the scenic adjuncts will greatly heighten the musical effect, and we hope that we may have the opportunity of judging of the work with its proper ensemble in the near future. The public became enthusiastic over the dances and the composer was called to the stage to acknowledge the continued plaudits.

After these dances came the most dancelike of Beethoven's symphonies—the seventh. It received a splendid interpretation with just the conservatism which we find so admirable in Mr. Gericke's Beethoven readings.

To us the seventh symphony is the most attractive of the nine, for it does not attempt the impossible (or at least the impracticable) as the ninth does, it is not unequal, going from grandeur to lightness as the "Heroic" does, and it combines popular melody with complex development in a manner that attracts musicians and laity a manner that attracts musicians and laity at the same time; it is the practical attainment of the "juste milieu."

It has the noblest introduction of any of the symphonies, and its transition into the chief theme, via a single note 61 times repeated, is most picturesque, spite of its reiteration.

The symphony presents [illegible] instances of the use of organ point, not only in this introduction but in the Trio of the Scherzo, the end of the first movement, and especially in the coda of the finale. It is also the most remarkable instance of rhythmic treatment extant, for the entire first movement is founded on a dactyl twice repeated, and the glorious Allegretto (the gem of the work) is only an apotheosis of a dactyl and a spondee (or trochee) in constant alternation. And with what persistency Beethoven here uses the device of dialogue between woodwind and strings! The conversation between these seems never-ending, yet never becomes tiresome!

Mr. Gericke rather insisted upon the "Allegretto" in the second movement. We doubt whether Beethoven fully expressed himself with this tempo-mark. He certainly vacillated between this and slower marks, and changed his ideas repeatedly about it. We fancy that Berlioz's idea that brooding was the chief characteristic of the movement is the true one; but, in avoiding the funereal character which Beethoven feared might come upon the heels of an "Andante" mark, he did not quite desire a resolute or a quick movement. If Mr. Gericke, however, gave a trifle too much of firmness to the movement it is certainly a failing that leans to virtue's side. The virility of the finale was inspiring and the power of the mighty bass reiterations was undeniable.

It is perhaps well that the public should take such a tonal tonic for at the next concert Zarathustra is to speak through his mortal mouthpiece—Richard Strauss.

Louis C. Elson.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the eighteenth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony Orchestra was:

Overture, "The Bartered Bride."....
Smetana
Spanish symphony, D minor, op. 21.
Lalo
Ballet music from opera "Azara,"..
J. K. Paine
Symphony No. 7, A major, op. 92..
Beethoven
Soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski.

Mr. Adamowski received a very hearty greeting on his appearance as soloist, and he played with his usual care and finish. He is a most conscientious artist, and he entered into the spirit of the work he interpreted. He was at his best in the third and fourth movements, and in these he aroused his audience into enthusiasm. Mr. Paine's three Moorish dances from his opera of "Azara" were a pleasant surprise, especially the first, the allegretto animato, which was graceful, vivacious and tuneful. The orchestra of all was unusually elaborate, but in two of the movements or dances seemed to overweight the subject matter and to deprive them of their dramatic interest. This, however, is simply from the stage point of view. The last movement is the least interesting and the least satisfying; the melody is not of a high character, and despite the richness of the orchestration gives more than one hint of the commonplace. Throughout, however, the master musician was in full evidence, and Mr. Paine easily demonstrated, if demonstration were needed, that he stands easily first among native composers; not only in knowledge and talents, but in the capacity to use these to their greatest advantage. His work was greeted with the heartiest applause, and it was read by Mr. Gerricke with rare spirit and sympathy. The Smetana overture was also read and played in the most delightful manner.

The program for the next concert is: Mozart's Symphony, C major; Beethoven's Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, G major; Richard Strauss' symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; and Weber's overture, "Oberon." The soloist will be Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi.

Music Notes.

On Monday evening the Kneisel Quartet will give a concert in Association Hall, assisted by Mme. Szumowska and Mr Max Zach. The programme is: Grieg's Quartet in G minor, op. 27; Faure's Sonata, A major for piano and violin and Brahm's quintet for two violins; two violas and violoncello, op. 88.

On Wednesday evening, March 28, the Roman Festival Mass and the Easter

---

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1900

The Next Symphony Soloist

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the Hungarian pianist, who is to be soloist at the next Symphony Concert, was born in Pressbury about twenty-two years ago. His father, a professor in the gymnasium (high school), was also an excellent musician, who, besides giving his son music lessons, refused to allow him to play in public, as a "boy prodigy," but made him take a course of study at the gymnasium. While at work there, Dohnanyi studied music under Carl Forstner, and later, under Koessler and Thoman. He completed his pianoforte study, however, under Eugen d'Albert.

In the season of '95-96 Dohnanyi played twice in Vienna, giving, with a violinist, concerts of piano and violin sonatas. In the winter of 1897 he gave two recitals, and on the 9th of January, 1898, he played the Beethoven G major concerto with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, under Hans Richter. On all these occasions he was well, if not enthusiastically, received and criticised. The following June, however, he played at one of Richter's Philharmonic concerts in London, and gave some recitals, with rather more decided success.

In the spring of 1898 Herr Ludwig Bösendorfer, the great piano maker, offered a prize, in memory of Hans von Bülow, for the best pianoforte concerto, the competition to be open to composers of all lands; the judges were Julius Epstein, Mr. Gericke, Alfred Grünfeld, Leschetizky and Rosenthal. Without much discussion they awarded the first prize to Ernst von Dohnanyi, who played his concerto the following winter in Vienna, winning more praise than he had in any of his previous appearances.

Dohnanyi gives, or rather did give, two years ago, the impression of being a player of good solid technique and of excellently trained musical ability, rather than a player of brilliant technique, or of tremendous warmth or fire.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of Professor Paine's Ballet Music From the Opera "Azara"—Mr. Timothee Adamowski Plays Lalo's "Spanish Symphony."

The program of the 18th Symphony concert was as follows:

Overture to "The Sold Bride"........Smetana
Spanish Symphony for Violin and Orchestra, in D minor, Op. 21.........Lalo
Ballet-Music from the Opera "Azara;"
Three Moorish Dances.............Paine
(First time.)
Symphony No. 7.....................Beethoven

The ballet music from Professor Paine's opera, "Azara," was played for the first time last night. It is a sad commentary on the state of opera in this country that Professor Paine is obliged to look to Germany for a production of a work to which he has devoted his talent for several years. Let us hope that a production there will bring the composer the laurel wreath that should be awarded him by his own countrymen for a new dramatic work!

The effect of this ballet music, written for the stage, would of course be enhanced by scenery, costumes, groupings and evolutions. It is planned for the opera house and it is built on broad foundations. In the concert room the first two dances are more effective than the third. The first has the more decided character. In the second, the latter section of the melody given to the English horn is not well adapted to the peculiar character of that instrument, and it is inherently commonplace. As a rule the music is sonorously scored, even when melodic invention is not marked, and it will no doubt serve its purpose in the opera. There was hearty applause and the composer left his seat and bowed his acknowledgments from the stage.

⁂

Mr. Adamowski gave much pleasure by his performance of Lalo's fascinating work. It was a performance characterized by appreciation of rhythm, wooing cantabile, warmth of tone, direct appeal, brilliance of bravura, and a liberal and spontaneous exhibition of the true virtuoso spirit.

⁂

With the exception of a slight slip or two, the performance of Smetana's overture was delightful. And here again I must deplore the wretched plight of opera in this country. Shall we never know this musical comedy except by the overture? Beethoven's 7th symphony, the one with the wondrous allegretto, brought the end of the concert.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON TIMES
ESTABLISHED 1864
EDITED BY ELMER RICE

March 11

The Symphony concerts fell into line last week and made "Sapho," the initial number of their concert programme. Of course it was not the "Sapho" that has caused so much discussion in court and elsewhere of late, but it was "Sapho" pure and simple just the same, being Goldmark's overture, founded on Byron's poetic heroine who loved and sang in the isles of Greece. Mr. T. Adamowski had a solo, "Symphonie Espagnole"; J. K. Paine's Moorish dames were played for the first time and the programme concluded with Beethoven's seventh symphony.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 70.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Prof. Paine's Moorish Dances Novelty of the Occasion.

Composer Bows His Acknowledgments of the Enthusiastic Applause—Mr. Timothee Adamowski Scores a Success in Lalo Symphony for Violin and Orchestra.

The programme for the 18th concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, "The Bartered Bride"......Smetana
Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra ... Lalo
Ballet music, from the opera "Azara"..... J. L. Paine
Symphony No. 7, in A major.........Beethoven

The soloist was Mr. Timothee Adamowski.

Prof. Paine's Moorish dances from his manuscript opera were the novelty of the occasion. Of course, they lose something in being heard apart from the stage incidents which they were intended to supplement, especially as they are not in the light, tripping style of conventional ballet; but they are, nevertheless, pleasurable in the hearing by reason of their flowing themes, their free, rhythmic swing, their rich and picturesque orchestration and their strong suggestion of appropriate local color.

The treatment of the melodies is ingenious, and at times exceedingly elaborate, but invariably clear and striking in its vigorously marked individuality. It is easy to imagine, interesting as they are detached from their place in the opera, that they would gain greatly in effectiveness with their proper essentials of dancers, action and scenery and in the stage situations that called them forth.

What now seems a little serious for ballet music would then undoubtedly disappear, and the true meaning of the whole would be more strongly emphasized, and the comparative sobriety of the music better understood. However, it was gratifying to hear these pieces even under the disadvantages named, for they showed the composer in the maturity of his powers, and in a style of composition which he had not before essayed.

The reading of them by Mr. Gericke, and their performance by his orchestra, were of a quality that must surely have delighted the composer, who runs applauded, at the close, with vigorous enthusiasm, and left his place in the auditorium to bow his acknowledgments from the stage.

Mr. Adamowski has never acquitted himself as a soloist with more brilliant success than attended his playing of the fine Lalo concerto. Not only was his technical presentation of the work admirable, but there was a sincerity in his style, a warmth of expression, a finish, a sustained power that entitle him to hearty compliment and as hearty congratulation. He was especially felicitous in the interpretation of the charming scherzando, and in the andante his contrabile was of a quality that can scarcely be overpraised. The whole effort showed a gratifying growth of the artist in the higher and more serious aspects of his art. The applause and the recalls he received were fairly earned and deservedly bestowed.

The Smetana overture increases in interest the oftener it is heard. It is hard to recall when it obtained so perfect and exquisitely colored an interpretation here as Mr. Gericke accorded it on this occasion, and when the splendid technique of the orchestra, especially of the strings, did such brilliant justice to it.

The Symphony, it need hardly be said, was treated reverently by Mr. Gericke, and in a spirit in which the conductor sank himself in the composer, instead of following the prevailing fashion of attempting to rise superior to him. The performance of the work was exceptionally interesting and satisfying.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C major, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in G major, Beethoven; "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Richard Strauss, and overture, "Oberon," Weber. The soloist is to be Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. MARCH 10, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY—THE APOLLO—MINOR CONCERTS, ETC.

Sappho retreated from Mr. Gericke's eighteenth Symphony programme, and the "introductory overture"—as the early [illegible] used to say—was therefore not Goldmark's sensuously dramatic one, but that light, gay, cheery, giggling, and yet firmly posed "Bartered Bride" of Smetana—a milder form of the "ewige Weibliche"—music. then followed that pleasing and picturesque Spanish concerto for violin—(not without some vein of poetry, too) of Lalo, for which its composer chose the title of symphony, perhaps, because of its five movements and its elaborate developments in accompaniment. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist and we have rarely heard him play with such nearly absolute mastery of his music and his methods. Beauty of tone, sentiment and grace of phrase are always his, but on this occasion he added strength, sonority, and firmness beyond his wont in the graver and more decisive statements, maintained delicacy and lightness with no passing uncertainty of intonation, and found the right touch of humor for the changeful second movement. Altogether his performance was of marked merit, and gave delight by its suggestion of true artistic growth as well as by its own persuasive and gratifying qualities.

When Professor Paine passsd with unswaying step from his uniquely comic setting of the "Radway's Ready Relief" advertisement to those solemn, sombre and stately "Œdipus" choruses, one felt that there was nothing left in the way of composition which he might not attempt and expect to achieve. Well, for a dozen years past he has been giving his leisure to the writing of a heroico-sentimental opera—words and music, a la Wagner, only his words mean something—and has at last published the libretto of "Azara," the publication of the score being still under treaty in Germany. Charles Dudley Warner, once writing about the adoption of Gothic forms into American architecture, said that we might also have borrowed from the Moors, "if the Moors had not been colored." Professor Paine was not afraid of that, and his subject and story are largely Moorish. So are the three quaint, sprightly, individual and emphatic dances which Mr. Gericke took from the opera and put in the third place of his programme. They have easy, suggestive rhythms and bright, entertaining orchestration, and would give a good choreographer some capital chances for varied display.

The symphony, which came last, was Beethoven's superb seventh, played, as also were the preceding numbers, in all sincerity and sympathy, and with technical perfection, although we should have liked a softer breathing for the introduction of the almost pathetic allegretto.

The next programme stands thus: Mozart, Symphony in C major (Koechel, 425), B. and H., No. 6; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major; Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra;" Weber, Overture, "Oberon;" soloist, Mr. Erast von Dohnanyi.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The dominant note of last week's symphony concert was cheerfulness. From the opening selection, the bright overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," to the pleasantly familiar seventh symphony of Beethoven, there was no suggestion of gloom—much less of morbidness—in M Gericke's program.

Our public so seldom has an opportunity of hearing a work of John Knowles Paine's composing that the presentation of selections from the opera on which the distinguished musician has been at work so long takes rank as a novelty of unusual importance. Of course, the "Moorish dances" from the opera "Azara," of which Mr Paine is both the librettist and composer, must be regarded as incidental to the work, a full hearing whereof is awaited with eagerness by his multitudinous admirers and well-wishers. Nevertheless, these dances give abundant evidence of rare scholarly skill in handling Moorish themes, as well as in giving orchestral effects. That Dr Paine has been as careful and assiduous a student of his art in dealing with these episodes, as in his more serious essays in the opera, may well be taken for granted. The dances were interpreted, under M Gericke's watchful baton, with great skill, the tempo of the music, at times difficult, and the contrasted effects of brooding melancholy on the one hand and demonstrative rejoicing on the other being demonstrated with notable skill.

Mr Timothee Adamowski, who has been for these many seasons a prime favorite with Boston audiences, and indeed has made warm friends wherever the Boston symphony orchestra is known and applauded, was the soloist. He performed with all his wonted technical skill and singular aptness in poetic expression, the solo part in Lalo's brilliant and unique Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra, dedicated to the famous Sarasate. Naturally Mr Adamowski's success was complete with his associate artists, as well as with the public. Even the usually undemonstrative throng at the rehearsal recalled him again and again, with most enthusiastic demonstration of appreciation and approval.

As a matter of course, father Beethoven, as represented by his joyous Seventh symphony was interpreted as a "labor of love" by the orchestra.

Ernest Von Dohnanyi, the pianist, is to perform Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major at this week's concerts. Once more the public is to have an opportunity of finding out, if possible, Richard Strauss' mind and purpose in his symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathrusta," or Zoroaster, whichever one prefers. Mozart's symphony in C major and Weber's "Oberon" overture will complete the program.

MONDAY, MARCH 12, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighteenth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Smetana: Overture to "Prodana nevesta."
Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra, in D minor, opus 21.
Paine: Ballet-Music from the Opera "Azara;" Three Moorish Dances. (First time.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the solo violinist.

It was an excellent idea to change Goldmark's overture to "Sappho," originally announced as first on the programme, for Smetana's "Prodana nevesta." Apart from reasons of expediency, it gave the programme a consistency of character that made it a work of art in itself. It was essentially a Dionysiac programme, every number on it telling of the joy of life, and for the most part in forms taken from the dance. And there was no monotony in it; the sharply contrasted individualities of the other composers—Beethoven, Lalo, Paine and Smetana—prevented that.

Smetana's overture to "Prodana nevesta" is a thing entirely by itself in modern music; one can almost fancy that Smetana set himself to say over again, in the musical dialect of 1866, what Mozart had said before him in his "Figaro" overture, written in 1786. There is no hint at anything like musical plagiarism, the style of the two works is very different; but the dominant mood of both is strikingly alike. All that is classical in Smetana's overture is a certain persistency of fugal treatment and a very unusual continuousness of mood; the remarkable distinction of style is not in itself classic. The thing is bright and sparkling as Mozart, its spirit as full of gay mischievousness as Offenbach; it fizzes like champagne from beginning to end. It is all very "malin." The performance was exceptional, one of those rare performances that reach to way above high water mark. It recalled a wonderful performance of Cherubini's "Anacréon" given by Mr. Gericke years ago, and never to be forgotten.

Professor Paine's "Azara" ballet music is a novelty for which our conoscenti have been smacking their lips for some time; it has been a curious experience to know that an American opera was gradually growing into completeness for years, out there in quiet, academic Cambridge, and not to hear the first note of it! Now at last we have heard these orchestral excerpts from Professor Paine's score—and we keep smacking our lips. It is odd that he calls them "three dances," for the second is but the trio of the first, the two really forming a single number between them. But this is by the way. This first dance in G minor, with its trio in G major, is in every way delightful. The Moorish local color is well emphasized, but in an easily natural manner that does not give the impression of the composer's having gone laboriously out of his way to get it. The themes are bright and fascinating, the working-up carried through with a very strong hand, the instrumentation masterly at every point. It is all very distinguished, too, brilliant and sparkling in the best sense. The opening theme of the second dance in A major, a seductive waltz-like motive, is a veritable trouvaille: that beginning in A minor, then going through F major to a suddent burst into A major, is exceedingly subtile and charming. Only the later, more cantabile, theme has less distinction; infinite life and go it surely has, but of a more commonplace cast, rather in the Sousa vein. On the stage, with a fine corps de ballet, its effect must be overwhelming; but in the concert-room this theme seems rather parvenu in its more elegant entourage. As in the first dance, the instrumentation is superb; both dances are a glow of beautiful orchestral color. The performance left nothing to be desired; the composer was twice called out and bowed his acknowledgments from the platform.

Beethoven's A major symphony was played as wonderfully as the Smetana overture. Here, too, was a record-breaking performance.

Lalo's Symphonie espagnole holds its own bravely; indeed, it sounded fresher and stronger last Saturday evening than when Mr. Adamowski last played it, in 1897. For one thing, he plays it better now than he did then. If this composition is a model of anything, it is of scoring a brilliant orchestral accompaniment to a solo violin; to obtain such flashing brilliance of orchestral color, without in the least overbalancing or veiling the solo part, has been given to few composers. To be sure, one sees how the trick is done; but this is no shame to it; only jugglers have to hide their methods, a composer plays with cards on the table. Mr. Adamowski played admirably. True, he was not equally in touch with the composer in all the movements; there are some things in this concerto-symphony which are as foreign to his nature as others are congenial. The mocking deviltry of the scherzando second movement is not quite his; he plays the thing properly and intelligently, but does not enter fully into its caustic Mephisto mood. On the other hand, he rises to the full romantic height of the Andante (third movement); here he is on his native heath, and plays with a poetic sentiment and expressive grace that carry all before them. In the finale he was truly brilliant. Upon the whole he was at his best, and we all know how good that best is. He was received and applauded with unfeigned enthusiasm.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in C major (Koechel, 425; Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 6); Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," opus 30; Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi will be the pianist. W. F. A.

TUESDAY, MARCH 13, 1900

THEY WANT ADAMOWSKI

Prominent Member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Been Offered an Important European Position as Conductor in Poland

Friends of Timothée Adamowski, of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has been identified from its start, so many years ago, and who was the soloist at its concerts of last week, have been much interested in hearing of an honor which has come to him from Warsaw, Poland. This is in the form of an offer to become conductor of an orchestra to be formed in that city and patterned after the symphony organization here.

Mr. Adamowski, in speaking today of the project and of his offer, said that already the matter is well started in Warsaw. The plan calls for a large stock company made up of all the members of the orchestra and some others who will stand back of them in as helpful a way as possible, though not in the same light in which Mr. Higginson is identified with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The players will all have individual interest in the financial success of the project as well as in its artistic success. The orchestra will give, as now planned, twelve strictly symphony concerts in the winter season at Warsaw, with popular concerts on Saturday and Sunday evenings, throughout the season. At these last-named concerts, patterned much like the promenade concerts in the Music Hall of this city, which Mr. Adamowski led one summer, beer, wines and other refreshments will be provided, and smoking will be allowed, while the more formal concerts will be conducted like the symphony series here. In the summer season the orchestra probably would go to some place in Russia, wherever opportunity might offer to the advantage of the players.

It is further planned to have other conductors, Mr. Nikisch being one of those considered, as well as Mr. Mlynarski, a conductor of fame in Poland. The stock company to put through this project lately was formally organized and officers chosen. One million roubles were subscribed for the erection of a building, work on which already has been begun. This will be in the form of a music hall suitable for its intended purposes of concert giving, and not arranged for operatic performances at all. The city of Warsaw gave the land to the stock company, the space being large enough to have the building surrounded by open squares, so that its exterior finish will be such as to make the hall a notable ornament to the architecture of the city. With the land thus given, the money subscribed can be put to most advantageous use in erecting a magnificent hall. It is thought that fully a year and a half will yet elapse before the building is finished, so Mr. Adamowski states. Among the strong friends of the plan is the Baron Kronenberg, the brother-in-law of Jean and Edouard de Reszke, and a man of great wealth. He probably will help out the company materially in providing the very best musical instruments to be had for the orchestra.

Mr. Adamokski is considering the offer made to him, and naturally feels the honor which it brings; but the time for beginning work there is some way ahead, and therefore he does not intend to act hastily. He feels that he and others of his countrymen should do all in their power for their country and its people, in any way possible for them to be of service. He realizes the importance of such an undertaking, and modestly hesitates at this time to fully commit himself to an acceptance of the offer. He stated today that, in his opinion, Mr. Gericke is the greatest conductor in the world, and he feels that under this able leader he has been given exceptional opportunities for study. "The standard of music is far higher here and in New York," said Mr. Adamowski, "than it is in Europe." He went on to say that he should like to feel certain of the probability of making the Warsaw orchestra of equally high standard, to satisfy him in joining forces with it. His experience in America has been of inestimable benefit to him, and he said he felt that Mr. Gericke's help and advice in the past and in this present opportunity would be of great value to him, just as he feels to be the case from sitting under Mr. Gericke's leadership for so many years. Mr. Adamowski's social relations in this city are of the pleasantest, as are those of his brother, Joseph Adamowski, the violoncellist, who also has an offer to join the orchestral forces in Warsaw. Should the two brothers eventually decide to take up their home in Warsaw, a string quartet would be formed there similar to the Adamowski Quartet, which for so long has given concerts in Boston.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 70.
SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Prof. Paine's Moorish Dances Novelty of the Occasion.

Composer Bows His Acknowledgments of the Enthusiastic Applause—Mr. Timothee Adamowski Scores a Success in Lalo Symphony for Violin and Orchestra.

The programme for the 18th concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture. "The Bartered Bride"......Smetana
Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra ... Lalo
Ballet music, from the opera "Azara"..... J. L. Paine
Symphony No. 7, in A major........Beethoven

The soloist was Mr. Timothee Adamowski.

Prof. Paine's Moorish dances from his manuscript opera were the novelty of the occasion. Of course, they lose something in being heard apart from the stage incidents which they were intended to supplement, especially as they are not in the light, tripping style of conventional ballet; but they are, nevertheless, pleasurable in the hearing by reason of their flowing themes, their free, rhythmic swing, their rich and picturesque orchestration and their strong suggestion of appropriate local color.

The treatment of the melodies is ingenious, and at times exceedingly elaborate, but invariably clear and striking in its vigorously marked individuality. It is easy to imagine, interesting as they are detached from their place in the opera, that they would gain greatly in effectiveness with their proper essentials of dancers, action and scenery and in the stage situations that called them forth.

What now seems a little serious for ballet music would then undoubtedly disappear, and the true meaning of the whole would be more strongly emphasized, and the comparative sobriety of the music better understood. However, it was gratifying to hear these pieces even under the disadvantages named, for they showed the composer in the maturity of his powers, and in a style of composition which he had not before essayed.

The reading of them by Mr. Gericke, and their performance by his orchestra, were of a quality that must surely have delighted the composer, who runs applauded, at the close, with vigorous enthusiasm, and left his place in the auditorium to bow his acknowledgments from the stage.

Mr. Adamowski has never acquitted himself as a soloist with more brilliant success than attended his playing of the fine Lalo concerto. Not only was his technical presentation of the work admirable, but there was a sincerity in his style, a warmth of expression, a finish, a sustained power that entitle him to hearty compliment and as hearty congratulation. He was especially felicitous in the interpretation of the charming scherzando, and in the andante his contrabile was of a quality that can scarcely be overpraised. The whole effort showed a gratifying growth of the artist in the higher and more serious aspects of his art. The applause and the recalls he received were fairly earned and deservedly bestowed.

The Smetana overture increases in interest the oftener it is heard. It is hard to recall when it obtained so perfect and exquisitely colored an interpretation here as Mr. Gericke accorded it on this occasion, and when the splendid technique of the orchestra, especially of the strings, did such brilliant justice to it.

The Symphony, it need hardly be said, was treated reverently by Mr. Gericke, and in a spirit in which the conductor sank himself in the composer, instead of following the prevailing fashion of attempting to rise superior to him. The performance of the work was exceptionally interesting and satisfying.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in C major, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in G major, Beethoven; "Thus Spake Zarathustra," Richard Strauss, and overture, "Oberon," Weber. The soloist is to be Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. MARCH 10, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY—THE APOLLO—MINOR CONCERTS, ETC.

Sappho retreated from Mr. Gericke's eighteenth Symphony programme, and the "introductory overture"—as the early minstrel men used to say—was therefore not Goldmark's sensuously dramatic one, but that light, gay, cheery, giggling, and yet firmly posed "Bartered Bride" of Smetana—a milder form of the "ewige Weibliche"—music. then followed that pleasing and picturesque Spanish concerto for violin—(not without some vein of poetry, too) of Lalo, for which its composer chose the title of symphony, perhaps, because of its five movements and its elaborate developments in accompaniment. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist and we have rarely heard him play with such nearly absolute mastery of his music and his methods. Beauty of tone, sentiment and grace of phrase are always his, but on this occasion he added strength, sonority, and firmness beyond his wont in the graver and more decisive statements, maintained delicacy and lightness with no passing uncertainty of intonation, and found the right touch of humor for the changeful second movement. Altogether his performance was of marked merit, and gave delight by its suggestion of true artistic growth as well as by its own persuasive and gratifying qualities.

When Professor Paine passsd with unswaying step from his uniquely comic setting of the "Radway's Ready Relief" advertisement to those solemn, sombre and stately "Œdipus" choruses, one felt that there was nothing left in the way of composition which he might not attempt and expect to achieve. Well, for a dozen years past he has been giving his leisure to the writing of a heroico-sentimental opera—words and music, a la Wagner, only his words mean something—and has at last published the libretto of "Azara," the publication of the score being still under treaty in Germany. Charles Dudley Warner, once writing about the adoption of Gothic forms into American architecture, said that we might also have borrowed from the Moors, "if the Moors had not been colored." Professor Paine was not afraid of that, and his subject and story are largely Moorish. So are the three quaint, sprightly, individual and emphatic dances which Mr. Gericke took from the opera and put in the third place of his programme. They have easy, suggestive rhythms and bright, entertaining orchestration, and would give a good choreographer some capital chances for varied display.

The symphony, which came last, was Beethoven's superb seventh, played, as also were the preceding numbers, in all sincerity and sympathy, and with technical perfection, although we should have liked a softer breathing for the introduction of the almost pathetic allegretto.

The next programme stands thus: Mozart, Symphony in C major (Koechel, 425), B. and H., No. 6; Beethoven, Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major; Richard Strauss, Symphonic Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra;" Weber, Overture, "Oberon;" soloist, Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 11, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The dominant note of last week's symphony concert was cheerfulness. From the opening selection, the bright overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," to the pleasantly familiar seventh symphony of Beethoven, there was no suggestion of gloom—much less of morbidness—in M Gericke's program.

Our public so seldom has an opportunity of hearing a work of John Knowles Paine's composing that the presentation of selections from the opera on which the distinguished musician has been at work so long takes rank as a novelty of unusual importance. Of course, the "Moorish dances" from the opera "Azara," of which Mr Paine is both the librettist and composer, must be regarded as incidental to the work, a full hearing whereof is awaited with eagerness by his multitudinous admirers and well-wishers. Nevertheless, these dances give abundant evidence of rare scholarly skill in handling Moorish themes, as well as in giving orchestral effects. That Dr Paine has been as careful and assiduous a student of his art in dealing with these episodes, as in his more serious essays in the opera, may well be taken for granted. The dances were interpreted, under M Gericke's watchful baton, with great skill, the tempo of the music, at times difficult, and the contrasted effects of brooding melancholy on the one hand and demonstrative rejoicing on the other being demonstrated with notable skill.

Mr Timothee Adamowski, who has been for these many seasons a prime favorite with Boston audiences, and indeed has made warm friends wherever the Boston symphony orchestra is known and applauded, was the soloist. He performed with all his wonted technical skill and singular aptness in poetic expression, the solo part in Lalo's brilliant and unique Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra, dedicated to the famous Sarasate. Naturally Mr Adamowski's success was complete with his associate artists, as well as with the public. Even the usually undemonstrative throng at the rehearsal recalled him again and again, with most enthusiastic demonstration of appreciation and approval.

As a matter of course, father Beethoven, as represented by his joyous Seventh symphony was interpreted as a "labor of love" by the orchestra.

Ernest Von Dohnanyi, the pianist, is to perform Beethoven's concerto No. 4 in G major at this week's concerts. Once more the public is to have an opportunity of finding out, if possible, Richard Strauss' mind and purpose in his symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathrusta," or Zoroaster, whichever one prefers. Mozart's symphony in C major and Weber's "Oberon" overture will complete the program.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, MARCH 12, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighteenth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Smetana: Overture to "Prodana nevesta."
Lalo: Symphonie Espagnole for Violin and Orchestra, in D minor, opus 21.
Paine: Ballet-Music from the Opera "Azara;" Three Moorish Dances. (First time.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the solo violinist.

It was an excellent idea to change Goldmark's overture to "Sappho," originally announced as first on the programme, for Smetana's "Prodana nevesta." Apart from reasons of expediency, it gave the programme a consistency of character that made it a work of art in itself. It was essentially a Dionysiac programme, every number on it telling of the joy of life, and for the most part in forms taken from the dance. And there was no monotony in it; the sharply contrasted individualities of the other composers—Beethoven, Lalo, Paine and Smetana—prevented that.

Smetana's overture to "Prodana nevesta" is a thing entirely by itself in modern music; one can almost fancy that Smetana set himself to say over again, in the musical dialect of 1866, what Mozart had said before him in his "Figaro" overture, written in 1786. There is no hint at anything like musical plagiarism, the style of the two works is very different; but the dominant mood of both is strikingly alike. All that is classical in Smetana's overture is a certain persistency of fugal treatment and a very unusual continuousness of mood; the remarkable distinction of style is not in itself classic. The thing is bright and sparkling as Mozart, its spirit as full of gay mischievousness as Offenbach; it fizzes like champagne from beginning to end. It is all very "malin." The performance was exceptional, one of those rare performances that reach to way above high water mark. It recalled a wonderful performance of Cherubini's "Anacréon" given by Mr. Gericke years ago, and never to be forgotten.

Professor Paine's "Azara" ballet music is a novelty for which our conoscenti have been smacking their lips for some time; it has been a curious experience to know that an American opera was gradually growing into completeness for years, out there in quiet, academic Cambridge, and not to hear the first note of it! Now at last we have heard these orchestral excerpts from Professor Paine's score—and we keep smacking our lips. It is odd that he calls them "three dances," for the second is but the trio of the first, the two really forming a single number between them. But this is by the way. This first dance in G minor, with its trio in G major, is in every way delightful. The Moorish local color is well emphasized, but in an easily natural manner that does not give the impression of the composer's having gone laboriously out of his way to get it. The themes are bright and fascinating, the working-up carried through with a very strong hand, the instrumentation masterly at every point. It is all very distinguished, too, brilliant and sparkling in the best sense. The opening theme of the second dance in A major, a seductive waltz-like motive, is a veritable trouvaille; that beginning in A minor, then going through F major to a suddent burst into A major, is exceedingly subtile and charming. Only the later, more cantabile, theme has less distinction; infinite life and go it surely has, but of a more commonplace cast, rather in the Sousa vein. On the stage, with a fine corps de ballet, its effect must be overwhelming; but in the concert-room this theme seems rather parvenu in its more elegant entourage. As in the first dance, the instrumentation is superb; both dances are a glow of beautiful orchestral color. The performance left nothing to be desired; the composer was twice called out and bowed his acknowledgments from the platform.

Beethoven's A major symphony was played as wonderfully as the Smetana overture. Here, too, was a record-breaking performance.

Lalo's Symphonie espagnole holds its own bravely; indeed, it sounded fresher and stronger last Saturday evening than when Mr. Adamowski last played it, in 1897. For one thing, he plays it better now than he did then. If this composition is a model of anything, it is of scoring a brilliant orchestral accompaniment to a solo violin; to obtain such flashing brilliance of orchestral color, without in the least overbalancing or veiling the solo part, has been given to few composers. To be sure, one sees how the trick is done; but this is no shame to it; only jugglers have to hide their methods, a composer plays with cards on the table. Mr. Adamowski played admirably. True, he was not equally in touch with the composer in all the movements; there are some things in this concerto-symphony which are as foreign to his nature as others are congenial. The mocking deviltry of the scherzando second movement is not quite his; he plays the thing properly and intelligently, but does not enter fully into its caustic Mephisto mood. On the other hand, he rises to the full romantic height of the Andante (third movement); here he is on his native heath, and plays with a poetic sentiment and expressive grace that carry all before them. In the finale he was truly brilliant. Upon the whole he was at his best, and we all know how good that best is. He was received and applauded with unfeigned enthusiasm.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in C major (Koechel, 425; Breitkopf and Härtel, No. 6); Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58; Richard Strauss, symphonic poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," opus 30; Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi will be the pianist.

W. F. A.

Boston Transcript
TUESDAY, MARCH 13, 1900

THEY WANT ADAMOWSKI

Prominent Member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Has Been Offered an Important European Position as Conductor in Poland

Friends of Timothée Adamowski, of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has been identified from its start, so many years ago, and who was the soloist at its concerts of last week, have been much interested in hearing of an honor which has come to him from Warsaw, Poland. This is in the form of an offer to become conductor of an orchestra to be formed in that city and patterned after the symphony organization here.

Mr. Adamowski, in speaking today of the project and of his offer, said that already the matter is well started in Warsaw. The plan calls for a large stock company made up of all the members of the orchestra and some others who will stand back of them in as helpful a way as possible, though not in the same light in which Mr. Higginson is identified with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The players will all have individual interest in the financial success of the project as well as in its artistic success. The orchestra will give, as now planned, twelve strictly symphony concerts in the winter season at Warsaw, with popular concerts on Saturday and Sunday evenings, throughout the season. At these last-named concerts, patterned much like the promenade concerts in the Music Hall of this city, which Mr. Adamowski led one summer, beer, wines and other refreshments will be provided, and smoking will be allowed, while the more formal concerts will be conducted like the symphony series here. In the summer season the orchestra probably would go to some place in Russia, wherever opportunity might offer to the advantage of the players.

It is further planned to have other conductors, Mr. Nikisch being one of those considered, as well as Mr. Mlynarski, a conductor of fame in Poland. The stock company to put through this project lately was formally organized and officers chosen. One million roubles were subscribed for the erection of a building, work on which already has been begun. This will be in the form of a music hall suitable for its intended purposes of concert giving, and not arranged for operatic performances at all. The city of Warsaw gave the land to the stock company, the space being large enough to have the building surrounded by open squares, so that its exterior finish will be such as to make the hall a notable ornament to the architecture of the city. With the land thus given, the money subscribed can be put to most advantageous use in erecting a magnificent hall. It is thought that fully a year and a half will yet elapse before the building is finished, so Mr. Adamowski states. Among the strong friends of the plan is the Baron Kronenberg, the brother-in-law of Jean and Edouard de Reszke, and a man of great wealth. He probably will help out the company materially in providing the very best musical instruments to be had for the orchestra.

Mr. Adamokski is considering the offer made to him, and naturally feels the honor which it brings; but the time for beginning work there is some way ahead, and therefore he does not intend to act hastily. He feels that he and others of his countrymen should do all in their power for their country and its people, in any way possible for them to be of service. He realizes the importance of such an undertaking, and modestly hesitates at this time to fully commit himself to an acceptance of the offer. He stated today that, in his opinion, Mr. Gericke is the greatest conductor in the world, and he feels that under this able leader he has been given exceptional opportunities for study. "The standard of music is far higher here and in New York," said Mr. Adamowski, "than it is in Europe." He went on to say that he should like to feel certain of the probability of making the Warsaw orchestra of equally high standard, to satisfy him in joining forces with it. His experience in America has been of inestimable benefit to him, and he said he felt that Mr. Gericke's help and advice in the past and in this present opportunity would be of great value to him, just as he feels to be the case from sitting under Mr. Gericke's leadership for so many years. Mr. Adamowski's social relations in this city are of the pleasantest, as are those of his brother, Joseph Adamowski, the violoncellist, who also has an offer to join the orchestral forces in Warsaw. Should the two brothers eventually decide to take up their home in Warsaw, a string quartet would be formed there similar to the Adamowski Quartet, which for so long has given concerts in Boston.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1900.

THE Boston Symphony fell into line this week at program making. Last week Goldmark's overture "Sapho" was announced; there is, however, no truth in the report that it was ordered off the program by the city authorities.

Smetana's "Bartered Bride" was substituted for "Sapho." J. K. Paine's "Moorish Dances" had the first hearing. They are taken from an opera in manuscript, and every line of them reveals the mastery with which Paine wields his pen. Even as a ballet suite they are not light in any sense, but are musical, melodious and rich in color.

Gericke conducted them with great sympathy, and the audience was vigorous in applause. The program:

Overture, Bartered Bride	Smetana
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin	Lalo
Moorish Dances (First time.)	Paine
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven

Soloist, T. Adamowski.

Dohnanyi will be the soloist at the next concert. He will play the Beethoven Concerto No. 4.

* * *

Leonora Jackson

With the Boston Symphony at Providence.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Leonora Jackson, scored a pronounced success. The young woman has received the largest amount of advance advertising that has been accorded to any artist in recent years. This would have been most dangerous were her talents mediocre. It is a pleasure to record the fact that in every way this young American violinist fulfilled expectations. Her technical equipment seems well-nigh perfect. While this is nothing more than is expected nowadays of every artist, the expectation is by no means always met. Her tone is pure and of sufficient breadth, her agility remarkable, her harmonics and chord-playing of impeccable accuracy, and she has a great bow arm. Her playing was delightful, and the audience fairly overwhelmed her with applause, recalling her four times at the conclusion of the number.—Providence Journal, March 8.

FRIDAY evening, March 9, Miss Jackson gave a recital at Dobbs Ferry-on-Hudson, at the Misses Masters' school. She was assisted by her brother, Ernest H. Jackson, at the piano, the program being as follows:

Concerto No. 4, in D minor	Vieuxtemps
Sonata in A major	Händel
Walther's Prize Song, from the Meistersinger	Wagner-Wilhelmj
Hungarian Dance	Brahms-Joachim
Nocturne in D flat	Chopin-Sarasate
Humoresque (Russian)	Tschaikowsky-Arensky
Berceuse (Russian)	Tschaikowsky-Arensky
Papillon (Butterfly)	Hubay
Madrigale (Italian)	Sinonetti-Bazzini
Sicilian Tarentelle (Italian)	Sinonetti-Bazzini

A little over six years ago Leonora Jackson, then a girl of thirteen, played on her violin for Mrs. Grover Cleveland, at a reception at the White House, in Washington, and convinced her hearers that she was endowed with a remarkable talent. Shortly afterward she went abroad to study. Miss Jackson returned in January, 1899, with a record that has never been surpassed by any American girl, a list of triumphs that more than realize the most enthusiastic predictions made for her, and which are of enough distinction and importance to justify the nation's pride in the plucky, gifted girl, who has spoken with her violin so eloquently for American art and artists.

With every most exclusive society abroad has Miss Jackson been the soloist, not once, but again; before crowned heads, on the programs with the greatest living artists; in nearly every musical centre in Europe, and on tour through the British Isles and the various countries on the Continent, the young violin virtuoso has commanded the attention and respect of press and public alike, and has justly won expressions of unqualified praise for her very rare talents and attainments.

Since her return to her native country for an extended tour, under Impresario Victor Thrane, she has filled engagements with all the important orchestral societies in America, and met with a series of ovations, which are but a repetition of her European triumphs.

Appended are some of Miss Jackson's triumphs:

December 15, 1893—Played for Mrs. Grover Cleveland at White House.
October, 17, 1896—Berlin début (Philharmonic Orchestra). Her master, Joachim, honored her by conducting.
November 11, 1896—Played before German Empress.
Winter, 1896-'97—Tour in Germany.
October 1, 1897—Won Mendelssohn State Prize ($375) at Berlin.
Autumn, 1897—Second German tour; soloist leading orchestras.
February 5, 1898—London début. (Queen's Hall Symphony).
Spring and Fall, 1898—First and second English tours. Appearances with Melba, Nordica, Paderewski and others. Soloist of Lamoureux and Crystal Palace Symphony Concerts, London; Manchester (Hallé), Liverpool and Leeds Philharmonics, &c.
December, 1898—Tour in Scotland with Scottish Orchestra; Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, &c.
Spring, 1899—Third German tour (Leipsic Gewandhaus, under Nikisch); Bremen, Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, and other symphony concerts.
April 17, 1899—Played before King of Sweden at Paris.
April 23, 1899—Paris début (Cologne Symphony Concert, at the Chatelet).
May 25, 1899—Played before Her Royal Highness Infanta Eulalia of Spain at Paris.
March 8, 1899—Soloist London Philharmonic.
July 17, 1899—Played before Queen Victoria at Windsor.
August 17, 1899—Played before Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice and royal party at Isle of Wight.
October, 1899—Third English tour (including Scotland).
November, 1899—Fourth German tour (Munich, under Weingartner; Leipsic, Frankfort, Strasbourg, &c.).
December, 1899—Swiss tour (Geneva, Neuchâtel, &c.).
Spring, 1900—American tour, including appearances with New York Philharmonic, the Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburg and St. Louis Symphony orchestras, and eight concerts on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WILL TIMOTHEE LEAVE BOSTON?

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1900.

ConductorGerickeBelieves It Not.

Says He Prefers Dear Boston.

Rumor Sends Him to Europe,

To Conduct a New Orchestra.

THE IDOL OF THE "POPS."

Violinist T. Adamowski, who, rumor has it, may cross the ocean to conduct a big orchestra at Warsaw, in his native Poland.

"I don't believe," said Conductor William Gericke to a Journal reporter last night, "that Mr. Adamowski will leave Boston. He told me last season that an orchestra was to be formed in Warsaw, but I know he enjoys living in Boston, and I am sure he will not leave it." And that is all the veteran Symphony Orchestra leader would say about the honor that has come to Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Maj. Higginson was "not at home" to reporters.

Wanted in Europe.

The story ran yesterday that friends of Timothee Adamowski, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has been identified from its start, so many years ago, and who was the soloist at its concerts of last week, had been much interested in hearing of an honor which has come to him from Warsaw, Poland. This is in the form of an offer to become conductor of an orchestra to be formed in that city and patterned after the symphony organization here.

Mr. Adamowski, in speaking of the project and of his offer, said that already the matter is well started in Warsaw. The plan calls for a large stock company made up of all the members of the orchestra and some others who will stand back of them in as helpful a way as possible, though not in the same light in which Mr. Higginson is identified with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The players will all have individual interest in the financial success of the project, as well as in its artistic success. The orchestra will give, as now planned, 12 strictly symphony concerts in the winter season at Warsaw, with popular concerts on Saturday and Sunday evenings throughout the season. At these last-named concerts, patterned much like the promenade concerts in the Music Hall of this city, which Mr. Adamowski led one summer, beer, wines and other refreshments will be provided, and smoking will be allowed, while the more formal concerts will be conducted like the symphony series here. In the summer season the orchestra probably would go to some place in Russia, wherever opportunity might offer to the advantage of the players.

Arthur Nikisch, Too.

It is further planned to have other conductors, Mr. Nikisch being one of those considered, as well as Mr. Mlynarski, a conductor of fame in Poland. The stock company to put through this project lately was formally organized and officers chosen. One million roubles were subscribed for the erection of a building, work on which already has begun. This will be in the form of a music hall suitable for its intended purposes of concert giving, and not arranged for operatic performances at all. The city of Warsaw gave the land to the stock company, the space being large enough to have the building surrounded by open squares, so that its exterior finish will be such as to make the hall a notable ornament to the architecture of the city. With the land thus given, the money subscribed can be but to most advantageous use in erecting a magnificent hall. It is thought that fully a year and a half will yet elapse before the building is finished, so Mr. Adamowiski states. Among the strong friends of the plan is the Baron Kronenberg, the brother-in-law of Jean and Edouard de Reszke, and a man of great wealth. He probably will help out the company materially in providing the very best musicl instruments to be had for the orchestr.

He Feels the Honor.

Mr. Adamowski is considering the offer made to him, and naturally feels the honor which it brings; but the time for beginning work there is some way ahead, and therefore he does not intend to act hastily. He feels that he and others of his countrymen should do all in their power for their country and its people, in any way possible for them to be of service. He realizes the importance of such an undertaking, and modestly hesitates at this time to fully commit himself to an acceptance of the offer. He stated today that, in his opinion, Mr. Gericke is the greatest conductor in the world, and he feels that under this able leader he has been given exceptional opportunities for study. "The standard of music is far higher here and in New York," said Mr. Adamowski, "than it is in Europe." He went on to say that he should like to feel certain of the probability of making the Warsaw orchestra of equally high standard, to satisfy him in joining forces with it. His experience in America has been of inestimable benefit to him, and he said he felt that Mr. Gericke's help and advice in the past and in this present opportunity would be of great value to him, just as he feels to be the case from sitting under Mr. Gericke's leadership for so many years. Mr. Adamowski's social relations in this city are of the pleasantest, as are those of his brother, Joseph Adamowski, the violoncellist, who also has an offer to join the orchestral forces in Warsaw. Should the two brothers eventually decide to take up their home in Warsaw, a string quartet would be formed there similar to the Adamowski Quartet, which for so long has given concerts in Boston.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1900.

THE Boston Symphony fell into line this week at program making. Last week Goldmark's overture "Sapho" was announced; there is, however, no truth in the report that it was ordered off the program by the city authorities.

Smetana's "Bartered Bride" was substi uted for "Sapho." J. K. Paine's "Moorish Dances" had the first hearing. They are taken from an opera in manuscript, and every line of them reveals the mastery with which Paine wields his pen. Even as a ballet suite they are not light in any sense, but are musical, melodious and rich in color.

Gericke conducted them with great sympathy, and the audience was vigorous in applause. The program:

Overture, Bartered Bride	Smetana
Symphonie Espagnole, for violin	Lalo
Moorish Dances (First time.)	Paine
Symphony No. 7	Beethoven

Soloist, T. Adamowski.

Dohnanyi will be the soloist at the next concert. He will play the Beethoven Concerto No. 4.

* * *

Leonora Jackson

With the Boston Symphony at Providence.

The soloist of the evening, Miss Leonora Jackson, scored a pronounced success. The young woman has received the largest amount of advance advertising that has been accorded to any artist in recent years. This would have been most dangerous were her talents mediocre. It is a pleasure to record the fact that in every way this young American violinist fulfilled expectations. Her technical equipment seems well-nigh perfect. . While this is nothing more than is expected nowadays of every artist, the expectation is by no means always met. Her tone is pure and of sufficient breadth, her agility remarkable, her harmonics and chord-playing of impeccable accuracy, and she has a great bow arm. Her playing was delightful, and the audience fairly overwhelmed her with applause, recalling her four times at the conclusion of the number.—Providence Journal, March 8.

FRIDAY evening, March 9, Miss Jackson gave a recital at Dobbs Ferry-on-Hudson, at the Misses Masters' school. She was assisted by her brother, Ernest H. Jackson, at the piano, the program being as follows:

Concerto No. 4, in D minor	Vieuxtemps
Sonata in A major	Händel
Walther's Prize Song, from the Meistersinger	Wagner-Wilhelmj
Hungarian Dance	Brahms-Joachim
Nocturne in D flat	Chopin-Sarasate
Humoresque (Russian)	Tschaikowsky-Arensky
Berceuse (Russian)	Tschaikowsky-Arensky
Papillon (Butterfly)	Hubay
Madrigale (Italian)	Sinonetti-Bazzini
Sicilian Tarentelle (Italian)	Sinonetti-Bazzini

A little over six years ago Leonora Jackson, then a girl of thirteen, played on her violin for Mrs. Grover Cleveland, at a reception at the White House, in Washington, and convinced her hearers that she was endowed with a remarkable talent. Shortly afterward she went abroad to study. Miss Jackson returned in January, 1899, with a record that has never been surpassed by any American girl, a list of triumphs that more than realize the most enthusiastic predictions made for her, and which are of enough distinction and importance to justify the nation's pride in the plucky, gifted girl, who has spoken with her violin so eloquently for American art and artists.

With every most exclusive society abroad has Miss Jackson been the soloist, not once, but again; before crowned heads, on the programs with the greatest living artists; in nearly every musical centre in Europe, and on tour through the British Isles and the various countries on the Continent, the young violin virtuoso has commanded the attention and respect of press and public alike, and has justly won expressions of unqualified praise for her very rare talents and attainments.

Since her return to her native country for an extended tour, under Impresario Victor Thrane, she has filled engagements with all the important orchestral societies in America, and met with a series of ovations, which are but a repetition of her European triumphs.

Appended are some of Miss Jackson's triumphs:

December 15, 1893—Played for Mrs. Grover Cleveland at White House.
October, 17, 1896—Berlin début (Philharmonic Orchestra). Her master, Joachim, honored her by conducting.
November 11, 1896—Played before German Empress.
Winter, 1896-'97—Tour in Germany.
October 1, 1897—Won Mendelssohn State Prize ($375) at Berlin.
Autumn, 1897—Second German tour; soloist leading orchestras.
February 5, 1898—London début. (Queen's Hall Symphony).
Spring and Fall, 1898—First and second English tours. Appearances with Melba, Nordica, Paderewski and others. Soloist of Lamoureux and Crystal Palace Symphony Concerts, London; Manchester (Hallé), Liverpool and Leeds Philharmonics, &c.
December, 1898—Tour in Scotland with Scottish Orchestra: Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dundee, &c.
Spring, 1899—Third German tour (Leipsic Gewandhaus, under Nikisch); Bremen, Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, and other symphony concerts.
April 17, 1899—Played before King of Sweden at Paris.
April 23, 1899—Paris début (Cologne Symphony Concert, at the Chatelet).
May 25, 1899—Played before Her Royal Highness Infanta Eulalia of Spain at Paris.
March 8, 1899—Soloist London Philharmonic.
July 17, 1899—Played before Queen Victoria at Windsor.
August 17, 1899—Played before Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice and royal party at Isle of Wight.
October, 1899—Third English tour (including Scotland).
November, 1899—Fourth German tour (Munich, under Weingartner; Leipsic, Frankfort, Strasbourg, &c.).
December, 1899—Swiss tour (Geneva, Neuchâtel, &c.).
Spring, 1900—American tour, including appearances with New York Philharmonic, the Chicago, Cincinnati, Pittsburg and St. Louis Symphony orchestras, and eight concerts on tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

WILL TIMOTHEE LEAVE BOSTON?

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 14, 1900.

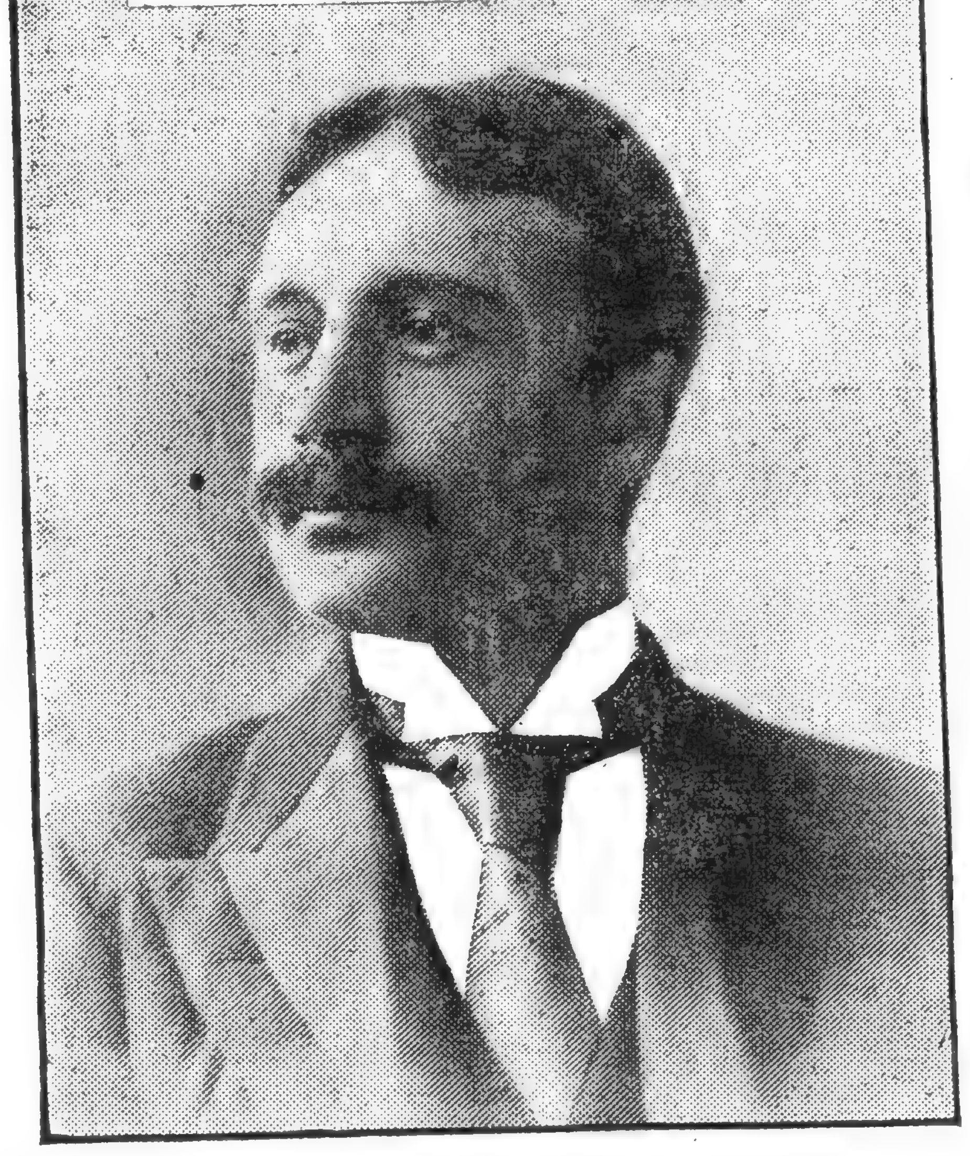
Conductor Gericke Believes It Not.

Says He Prefers Dear Boston.

Rumor Sends Him to Europe,

To Conduct a New Orchestra.

"I don't believe," said Conductor William Gericke to a Journal reporter last night, "that Mr. Adamowski will leave Boston. He told me last season that an orchestra was to be formed in Warsaw, but I know he enjoys living in Boston, and I am sure he will not leave it." And that is all the veteran Symphony Orchestra leader would say about the honor that has come to Mr. Timothee Adamowski. Maj. Higginson was "not at home" to reporters.



THE IDOL OF THE "POPS."

Violinist T. Adamowski, who, rumor has it, may cross the ocean to conduct a big orchestra at Warsaw, in his native Poland.

Wanted in Europe.

The story ran yesterday that friends of Timothee Adamowski, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has been identified from its start, so many years ago, and who was the soloist at its concerts of last week, had been much interested in hearing of an honor which has come to him from Warsaw, Poland. This is in the form of an offer to become conductor of an orchestra to be formed in that city and patterned after the symphony organization here.

Mr. Adamowski, in speaking of the project and of his offer, said that already the matter is well started in Warsaw. The plan calls for a large stock company made up of all the members of the orchestra and some others who will stand back of them in as helpful a way as possible, though not in the same light in which Mr. Higginson is identified with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The players will all have individual interest in the financial success of the project, as well as in its artistic success. The orchestra will give, as now planned, 12 strictly symphony concerts in the winter season at Warsaw, with popular concerts on Saturday and Sunday evenings throughout the season. At these last-named concerts, patterned much like the promenade concerts in the Music Hall of this city, which Mr. Adamowski led one summer, beer, wines and other refreshments will be provided, and smoking will be allowed, while the more formal concerts will be conducted like the symphony series here. In the summer season the orchestra probably would go to some place in Russia, wherever opportunity might offer to the advantage of the players.

Arthur Nikisch, Too.

It is further planned to have other conductors, Mr. Nikisch being one of those considered, as well as Mr. Mlynarski, a conductor of fame in Poland. The stock company to put through this project lately was formally organized and officers chosen. One million roubles were subscribed for the erection of a building, work on which already has begun. This will be in the form of a music hall suitable for its intended purposes of concert giving, and not arranged for operatic performances at all. The city of Warsaw gave the land to the stock company, the space being large enough to have the building surrounded by open squares, so that its exterior finish will be such as to make the hall a notable ornament to the architecture of the city. With the land thus given, the money subscribed can be but to most advantageous use in erecting a magnificent hall. It is thought that fully a year and a half will yet elapse before the building is finished, so Mr. Adamowiski states. Among the strong friends of the plan is the Baron Kronenberg, the brother-in-law of Jean and Edouard de Reszke, and a man of great wealth. He probably will help out the company materially in providing the very best musicl instruments to be had for the orchestr.

He Feels the Honor.

Mr. Adamowski is considering the offer made to him, and naturally feels the honor which it brings; but the time for beginning work there is some way ahead, and therefore he does not intend to act hastily. He feels that he and others of his countrymen should do all in their power for their country and its people, in any way possible for them to be of service. He realizes the importance of such an undertaking, and modestly hesitates at this time to fully commit himself to an acceptance of the offer. He stated today that, in his opinion, Mr. Gericke is the greatest conductor in the world, and he feels that under this able leader he has been given exceptional opportunities for study. "The standard of music is far higher here and in New York," said Mr. Adamowski, "than it is in Europe." He went on to say that he should like to feel certain of the probability of making the Warsaw orchestra of equally high standard, to satisfy him in joining forces with it. His experience in America has been of inestimable benefit to him, and he said he felt that Mr. Gericke's help and advice in the past and in this present opportunity would be of great value to him, just as he feels to be the case from sitting under Mr. Gericke's leadership for so many years. Mr. Adamowski's social relations in this city are of the pleasantest, as are those of his brother, Joseph Adamowski, the violoncellist, who also has an offer to join the orchestral forces in Warsaw. Should the two brothers eventually decide to take up their home in Warsaw, a string quartet would be formed there similar to the Adamowski Quartet, which for so long has given concerts in Boston.

[84]

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

Mar 26 [illegible]

OFFER TO ADAMOWSKI.

Is Asked to Become Conductor of Orchestra in Warsaw.

Timothee Adamowski, one of the first violins of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has received an offer from Warsaw, Poland, to become conductor of an orchestra to be formed in that city.

Mr. Adamowski, in speaking yesterday of the project and of his offer, said that already the matter is well started in Warsaw. The plan calls for a large stock company made up of all the members of the orchestra and some others who will stand back of them in as helpful a way as possible.

The orchestra will give, as now planned, twelve strictly symphony concerts in the winter season at Warsaw, with popular concerts on Saturday and Sunday evenings throughout the season. These last-named concerts will be patterned much like the promenade concerts in the Music Hall of this city, which Mr. Adamowski led one summer.

The stock company to put through this project lately was formally organized and officers chosen. One million roubles were subscribed for the erection of a building, work on which already has been begun.

Among the strong friends of the plan is the Baron Kronenberg, the brother-in-law of Jean and Edouard de Reszke, and a man of great wealth.

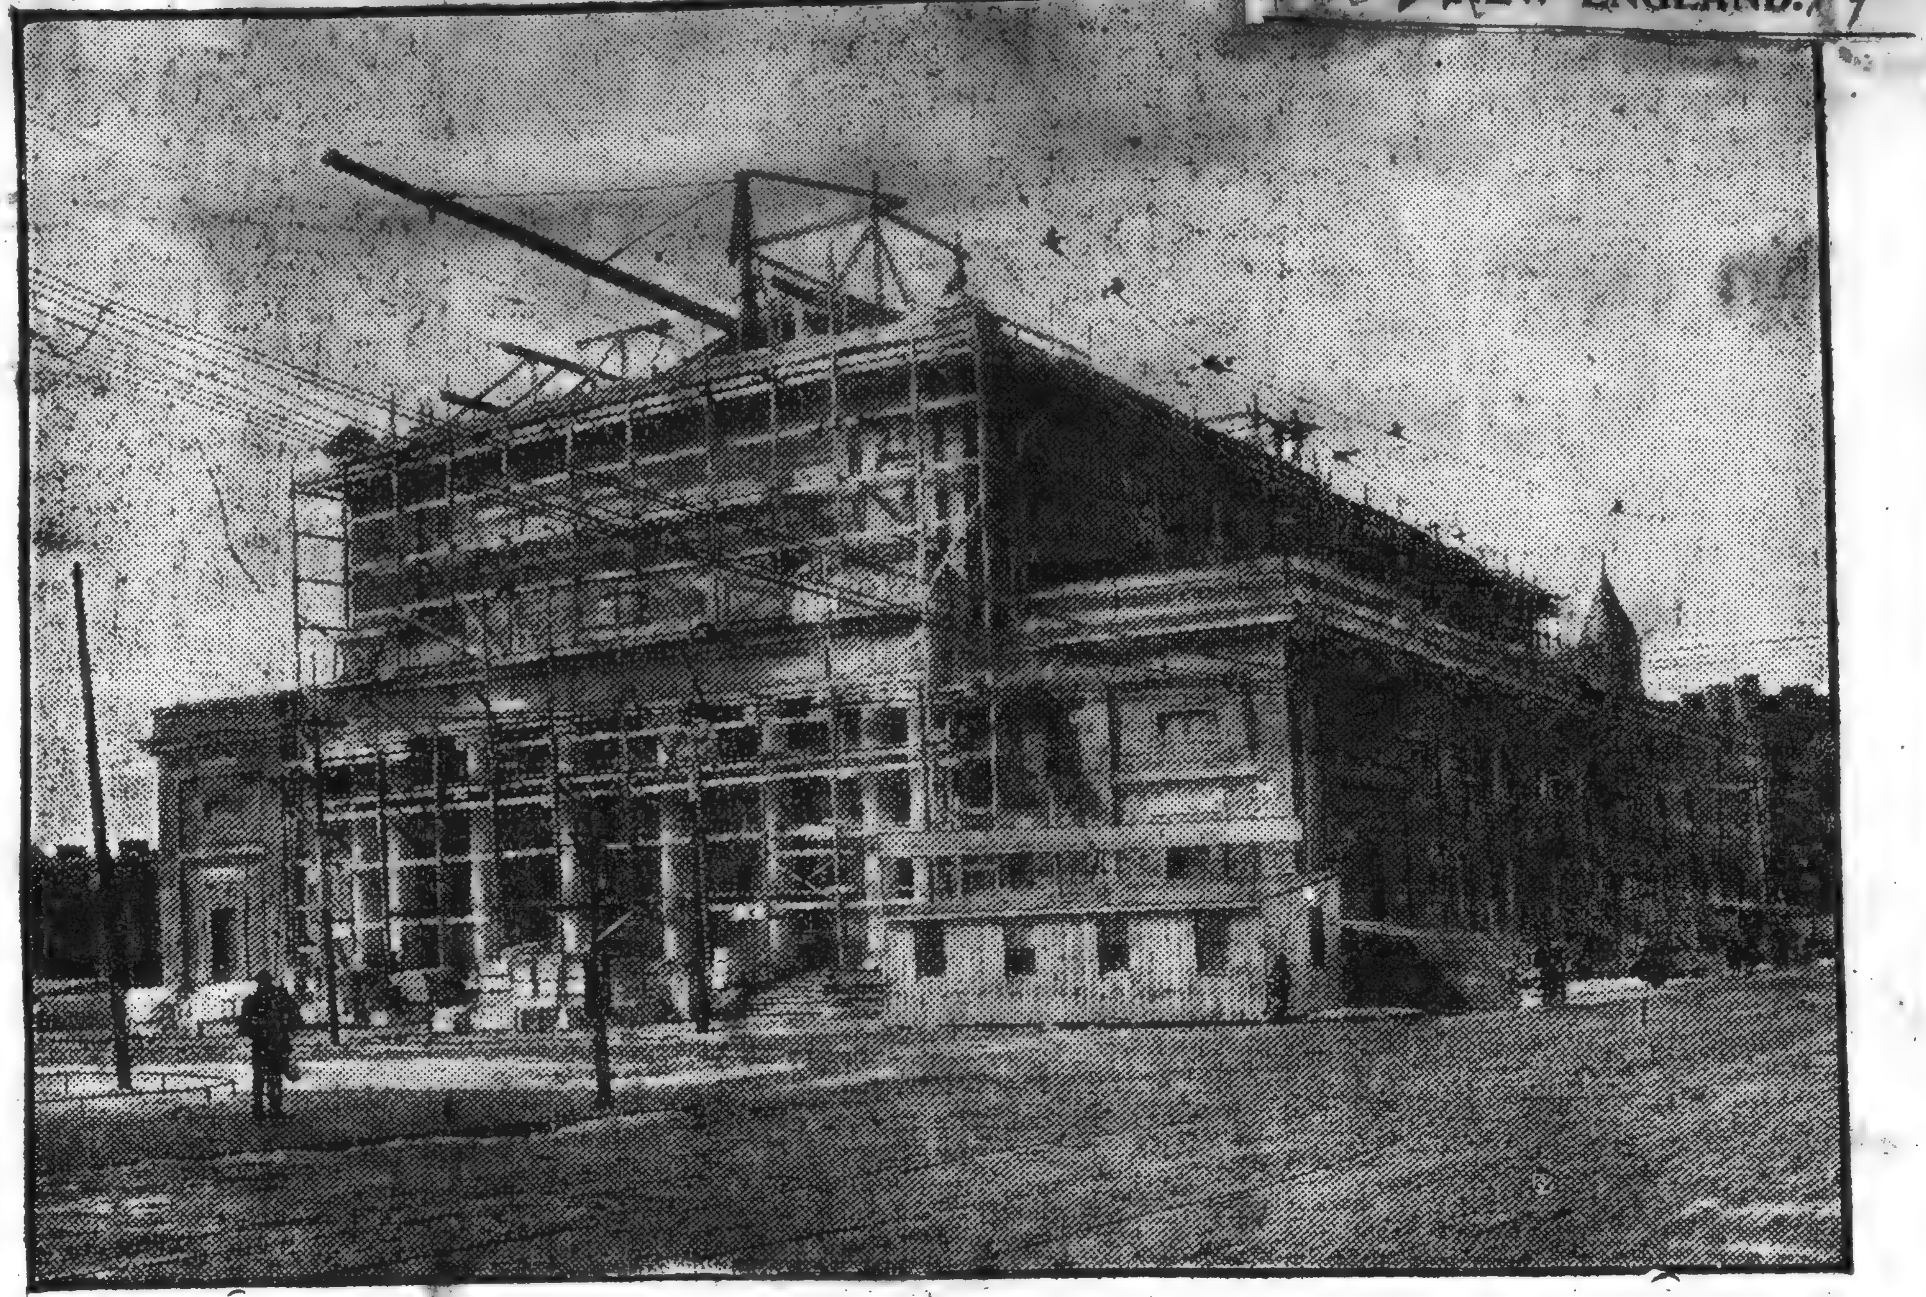
Mr. Adamowski is considering the offer made to him, and naturally feels the honor which it brings; but the time for beginning work there is some way ahead, and therefore he does not intend to act hastily.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.

Exterior Nearly Completed—Structure Probably Ready for Use Soon After First of June.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

Mar 6 19



BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL AS IT LOOKS TODAY.
Fine facade, practically finished, is plainly to be inspected through the stagings which as yet remain.

Boston's new Music Hall, at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues, is nearly completed, so far as the outside goes. The builders expect to complete the hall about June 1.

Not until the building is completed will the public be able to judge of the success of the undertaking. Whether or not the rumble of the electric cars on both streets will be heard within the building is a question which time alone will answer.

In the interior of the building enough of the two balconies has been constructed to give one an idea of their strength. The framework is of different sizes of common structural girders and stringers. Supporting the entire framework are the posts, six in number, at the main entrance. It is interesting to note that the posts are set very far in, so far that they will but little, if at all, obstruct the view of those sitting in the rear seats.

At the farther end of the building work is being done about the stage, and the rooms adjacent will soon be partitioned off. The stage will be 58 feet in length and 25 feet in depth. In the rear will stand the great organ.

The facade of the building on Huntington avenue is now practically completed, and the general appearance of the columns with their Ionic capping is well seen through the staging which remains. The doorways have an ample appearance. The pillars support an entablature with a simple block and space work, surmounted with some scroll work. The material used is Indiana limestone.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL TODAY.

Photograph of the Partly Completed Building on the Corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues.

BOSTON'S new Music Hall building, heretofore pictured only from drawings made from the original design, is reproduced on this page from the latest photograph taken of it, and shows the building nearly completed as far as its outside is concerned.

The new building, on the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues, is a busy place these days, and now that the walls have been practically all closed in the great edifice begins to look like something. The sound of the hammer is heard on every hand, from cellar to ceiling; the man with the trowel is in the corridors setting in bricks and tiling, while at short intervals is heard the jingle of the elevator bell, signals from the man on high to the man below to hurry along the loads of mortar from the basement. The dummy engine itself contributes to the noise with its hysterical snorting.

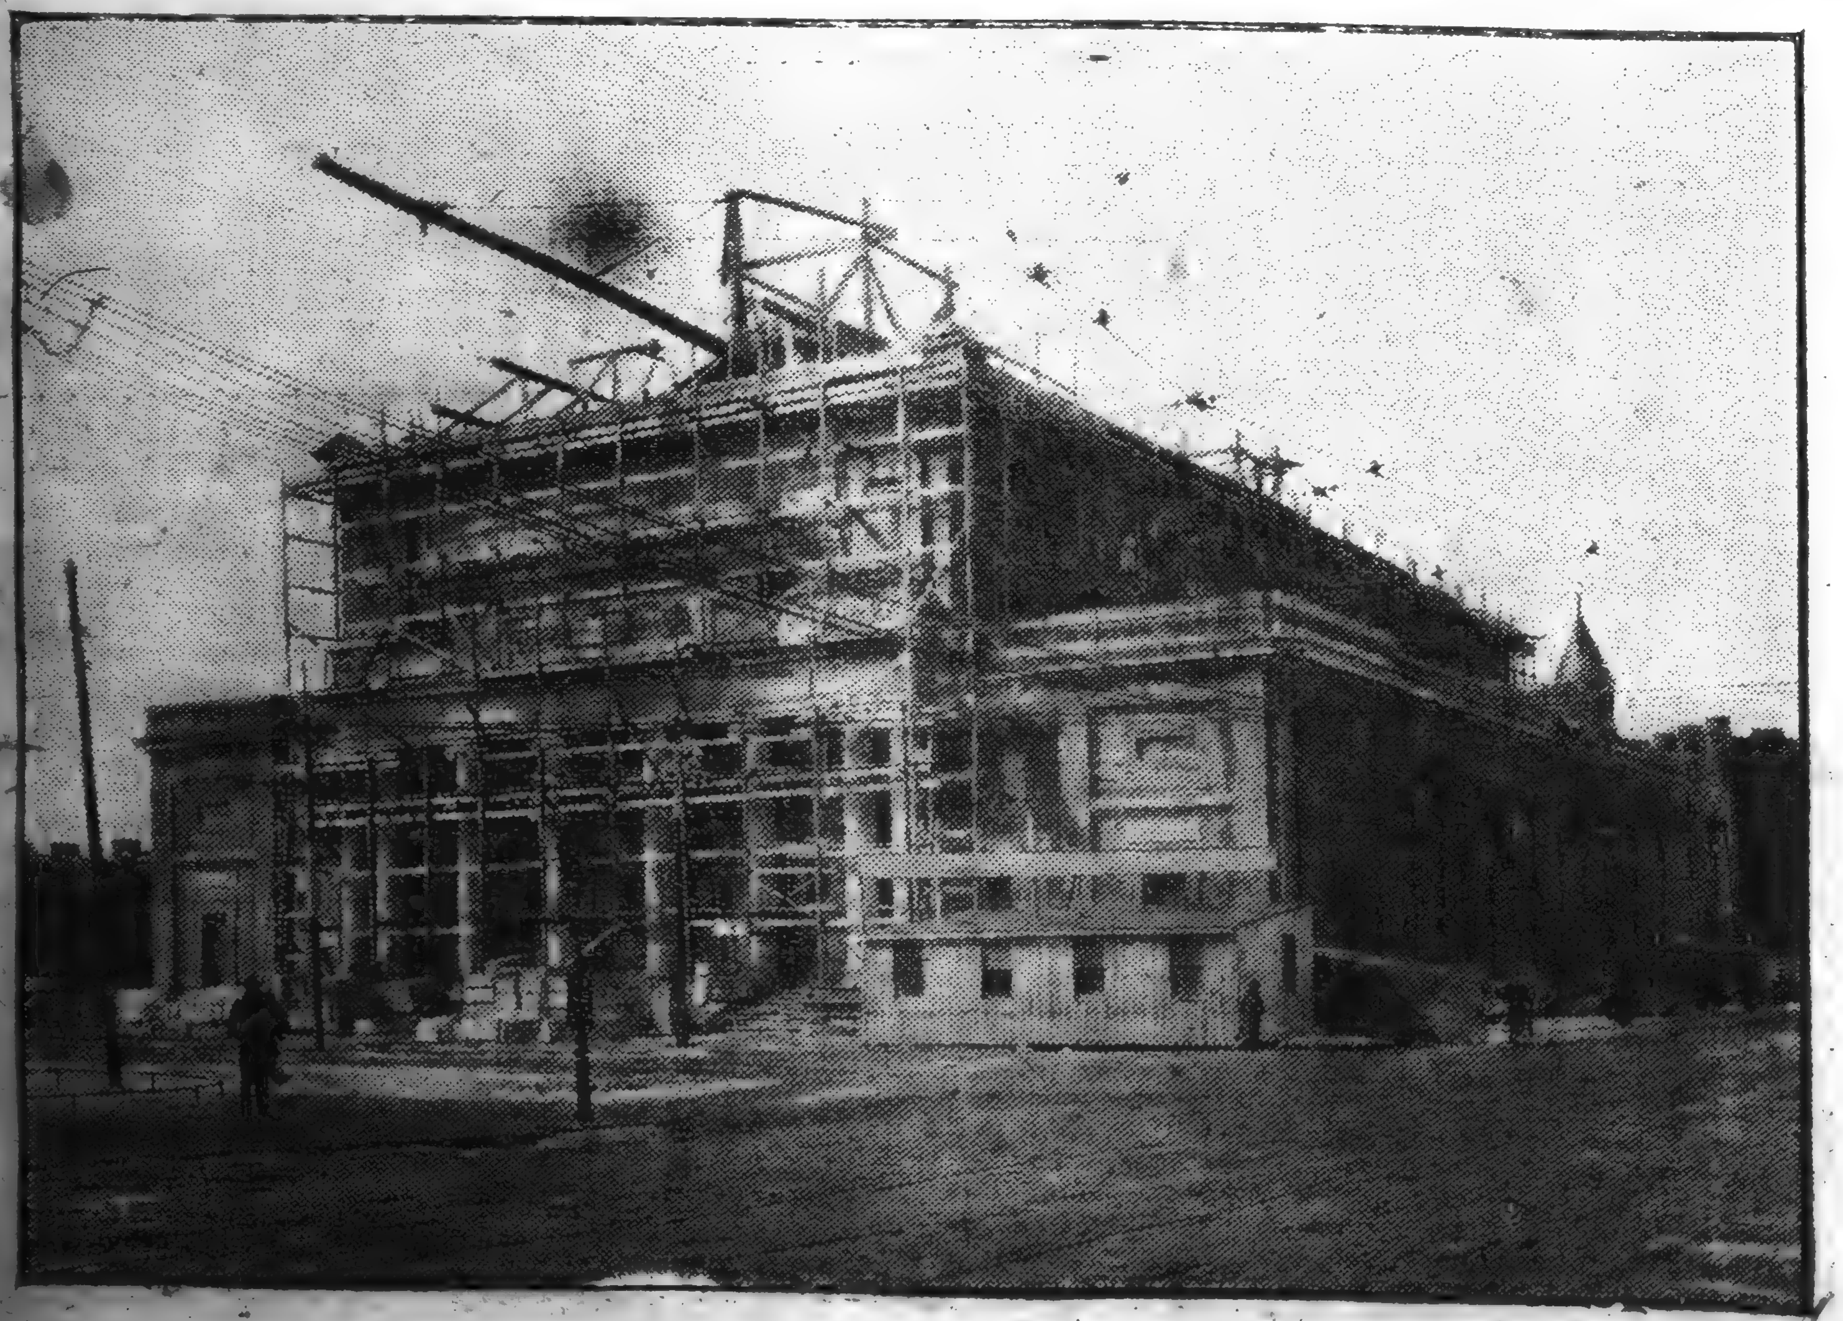
SYMPHONY OF SOUND.

Sounds like these are in symphony, if they are not in harmony; and, while it might not do to say that the building is already a "music hall," there is certainly merry music to be heard there the day long. Two hundred men have been variously engaged, and added to them are a lot of newcomers at work, the army of plasterers.

The building will be completed, it is announced by the builders, about June 1. While the weather for the winter, as a whole, has been most favorable to the progress of the work, there has been some unavoidable delay, it is stated, because of the failure to receive the structural iron on time. Since the first of the year work has been hurried along. There has been no working at night yet, but something in this line is expected before long.

AN UNSOLVED PROBLEM.

Not until the building is completed will the public be able to judge of the success of the undertaking. Whether or not the rumble of the electric cars on both streets will be heard within the building is a question which time only will answer. And whether the passing motorman can be taught to ring his gong in regular "two-four" or "three-four" time according to the signal displayed from the building is another matter which next summer will reveal.



THE PARTLY CONSTRUCTED MUSIC HALL BUILDING.
The latest photograph of Boston's new temple of music, an imposing structure. Many laborers, hard at work, hope to have it completed by June 1 next.

On entering the building the visitor finds the work progressing rapidly.

Enough of the two balconies has been constructed to give one an idea of their strength. The framework is of different sizes of common structural girders and stringers. Supporting the entire framework are the posts, six in number at the main entrance. It is interesting to note that the posts are set very far in, so far that they will but little, if at all, obstruct the view of those sitting in the rear seats.

A LARGE STAGE.

At the opposite end of the building work is being done about the stage, and the rooms adjacent will soon be partitioned off. The stage will be 58 feet in length and 25 feet in depth. In the rear will stand the great organ.

The building will furnish its own lighting by means of the two 100-horse power and one 50-horse power engine that will be installed in the basement. The work of wiring has already been begun.

The building will be made fireproof through the use of tiling, firebrick and the iron flooring, which latter will extend throughout, even to the basement.

The facade of the building on Huntington Avenue is now practically completed, and the general appearance of the columns with their Ionic capping is well seen through the staging which remains. The doorways have an ample appearance. The pillars support an entablature with a simple block and space work, surmounted with some scroll work. The material used is Indiana limestone.

The brick-work of the building is constructed on the Flemish style, with a "leader and a stretcher," so-called, alternating, that is, the exterior shows alternately, one over the other, the sides and the ends of the bricks.

ESTABLISHED 1813.

Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 19, 1900.

Dohnanyi, Pianist—Strauss' "Zarathustra."

The great orchestral number of Saturday's concert was Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus spake Zarathustra"); the programme began, however, with "Also sprach Mozart," and the speech of the last-named was much more intelligible than the metaphysics of the founder of Zoroastrianism. It was a Mozart symphony in C that began the concert; not the great "Jupiter" symphony, yet not so very far behind it either.

It received a perfect performance and it inculcated the lesson that there was once a time when beauty, symmetry and melody existed in music, an epoch when almost everybody could understand what was performed. The dainty little canon in the Trio of the Minuet presented counterpoint of a very different order from that which came later; only the finale of the symphony seemed a trifle weak in its conventional gaiety, a well-bred hilarity which is always present in the old symphony finale and is as fixed as the smile of a ballet-girl.

Enter Dohnanyi and Beethoven's piano concerto in G major! We of Boston are well acquainted with this fourth concerto, the gentle sister of the imperious fifth, for Prof. Baermann has played it to us more than once and D'Albert has also won success here with the work. It is a good test of musicianship in a pianist, for one must steer between the temptation to aggrandize the subtle effects, on the one hand, and the desire to sentimentalize, on the other.

Mr. Dohnanyi kept the true artistic path; at first there was a tendency to over-clearness which led to a non-legato that was almost a staccato, but this soon wore away. There was plenty of technique in the performance but it was always subjugated to the ensemble, it was never thrust into unfitting prominence.

The cadenza in the first movement (Mr. Dohnanyi's own composition) was well developed from the themes, and was not too showy for the delicate concerto. By the end of the first movement one felt sure that a new artist of high rank had come to us.

The slow movement erred a little on the side of reserve. It is one of the softest movements in the entire repertoire, a movement in which it is impossible to over-use the soft pedal. The orchestra was tempered to the whispered phrases, and the ensemble was something that the players could well be proud of. Yet we have heard better effect made with this movement. The final rondo, however, was splendidly played, with a sufficient amount of verve and abandon. Again the cadenza was the work of the pianist himself. It was scarcely as fine a production as the first one, nor was Beethoven's injunction, "La Cadenza sia corta,"—quite obeyed.

We hope to see the time when the cadenza shall be banished from the concerto. Established by Mozart, who was always ready to concede chances for personal display to the artist, the cadenza almost always runs the risk of disturbing the continuity of the work. That Beethoven commanded it to be short here, is a straw showing the direction of the wind; in his next concerto we find the solo cadenza forbidden (in the first movement), and a brilliant climax for piano and orchestra introduced in its stead, a sort of ensemble cadenza. We find Brahms viewing it with distrust, and even Mendelssohn transferring it to the middle of the movement (in his violin concerto), in constant dread of the cadenza degenerating into a mere triumph of technique and individual display.

Mr. Dohnanyi deserves credit for the manner in which he avoided this fault in the construction, and the performance of his two cadenzas. In this, as in every other direction, he showed himself to be a true musician. He was recalled again and again at the close of the performance. We must hear more of this pianist; he is one of the really important players of the present time.

And now Zarathustra was unchained! Never has the stupendous work received so fine a reading; Mr. Gericke and each of his men may take a personal pride in the result attained; we frankly doubt whether the complicated composition has ever been heard anywhere to such good advantage.

Richard Strauss has proved Wagner in the wrong; instrumental music has not yet reached its limits; the scoring and the treatment of themes go beyond what was deemed possible in 1883 (the year of Wagner's death), but it is difficult to see how anything can be added to the orchestra of the future, unless we join locomotives and fire engines to the forces. Far be it from us to sneer or jest at such a work; agree with it or not, it compels respect; genius flares forth even in its opening measures. Once upon a time the opening measures (trombone chords) of Mozart's "Requiem" were held to be as solemn a beginning as could be imagined; if those measures opened the gates of the tomb, then here the gates of eternity swing upon their hinges.

But is such a metaphysical work properly within the domain of music? Is that true music which demands a pre-study of a mystic's volume and a knowledge of Zoroaster, Ormuzd and Ahriman? We cannot deny that we were profoundly moved by the composition and that we found in it some points of ineffable beauty. Here is the one man, among the ultra-moderns, who has something to say, and when he says it, Bruckner, Vincent d'Indy, and the whole tribe of cacophonists shrivel up. But what could Strauss bring to Art if he became a pre-Wagnerian? If Saul became Paul, what glories might be expected!

In this work one is placed in a tropical jungle of figures and themes and it is almost impossible to find the beginning and end of any one of them. A beautiful thought begins—it is labelled "Of Joys and Passions"—it is overwhelmed before it reaches anything like maturity; a strange, passionless theme follows, chiefly upon the [illegible], which seem to indicate that Zoroaster sought Nirvana, a la Buddha, but this too is very soon crushed out; a dancing theme is quite definite, and dainty enough too, but this also is swallowed in the maelstrom of orchestration and of [illegible] progressions; a frenzied fugal passage is ticketed "Of Science," but science [illegible] to discover nothing more than a [illegible] of crickets merrily chirping on the [illegible]; a bell tolls midnight, and a host [illegible] fantastical ideas are woven [illegible] and finally matters end in two [illegible], to show that all human wisdom [illegible] to uncertainty. Can Music [illegible] a story? If so we may yet [illegible] symphony on integral calculus [illegible] Kantian transcendental-

[illegible] the wonders of the [illegible] and heartily complimenting [illegible] and the orchestra upon the successful completion of a herculean task.

It was well to give something shapely after this musical problem; if the audience had been dismissed after the final mixture of the keys of B major and C major (also endet Zarathustra!) few of them would have been able to find their way home. Weber's "Oberon" overture gave them a firm foothold again; but we must confess it sounded mighty tame. Even the heavy chord of the first part, held to be one of the most explosive effects in music, seemed gentle and mild, and although the clarinette played beautifully, its tootlings sounded conventional after the flammivomous work which preceded it. The Russians sometimes end a wild banquet by pouring all the liquors left at table into a large bowl, adding a couple of bottles of brandy, setting the whole on fire, and then drinking their final toasts in this strong brew. If any one introduces this Russian Punch into Music it will be Richard Strauss.

Louis C. Elson.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813

March 17

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the nineteenth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra was:

Symphony No. 36, C major.........Mozart.
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, G major, op. 58.........................Beethoven.
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," op. 30.........Richard Strauss.
Overture to "Oberon".............Weber.
Soloist, Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi.

This was a most interesting concert, and in Mr. Dohnanyi the music-loving public heard a thorough artist, even though as yet he is not the faultless master. The selecting of the Beethoven concerto shows the metal of which he is made and his interpretation of it the high quality of his talents.. It was an interpretation without a trace of sentimental morbidness in it; a frank, manly interpretation, played in a large, free style and with a rare and unexpected deference to the intentions of the composer. Perfection was not reached, but that is simply a question of time; the full opening of the flower now in healthy and most promising bud. The artist made no attempt to cast his shadow on the composer; nor did he intrude his personality on the audience by affectation of manner or of style. Technically, his equipment is of the best; he has, as might be expected well educated and trained fingers, and what is more creditable the tones they produce are most pleasing in quality. He never uses the too frequent trick of "pounding," nor the equally frequent trick of contrasting whispering pianissimo with string-splitting fortissimo; he does not avoid mezzo piano as if it were the plague, nor use his arm as a blacksmith's hammer. All that he does is artistic; he has intelligence, taste and feeling and he keeps them all on this side of morbidness. The work he performed is deserving of very high and unstinted praise and he had the effect of all round artistic work in his audience, rousing them into spontaneous enthusiasm and compelling the young man to appear again and again to bow his thanks.

Particular praise is due to Mr. Gericke for the masterly manner in which he read the Strauss work; a reading that brought meaning and order out of seeming chaos and allowed one to appreciate the beauties of a work that has probably been underestimated. There was no world-splitting tempest in Mr. Gericke's reading; there were fine gradations of coloring, and fine shades of contrast, and the ideas of the composer could be followed in all their complex development. It was a noble reading of a most original and impressive work, and it was played with rare brilliancy and finish by the orchestra.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 18, 1900.
(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The nineteenth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. The soloist was the Hungarian pianist, Ernst Von Dohnanyi.

SUNDAY, MARCH

DOHNANYI

A Pianist That Is Also a Musician.

R. Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

An Unfamiliar Symphony Contrast.

The program of the 19th Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Symphony, C major, 425..........................Mozart
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major.. ....Beethoven
Cadenzas by Mr. Dohnanyi.
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," ....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Oberon,"........................Weber

Mr. Ernest von Dohnányi made his first appearance in Boston last night. His first appearance in this country was at the Symphony concert Thursday night at Cambridge.

The young pianist is first of all a musician; not because he composed his own cadenzas to the concerto, for these cadenzas are by no means distinguished—they are in fact, respectable and ineffective, as though the composer had been afraid of doing something that would seem ahead of Beethoven's period, and thus they were merely diluted spirits of Beethoven; not because he wrote these cadenzas, I repeat, but because throughout the concerto he proved himself an admirable musician in the essential qualities; in firm grasp of the composer's ideas, in sense of proportion, in beauty of phrasing. He understood the music and he reproduced it as only an accomplished musician can interpret.

I am aware that exception might be taken to his treatment of the first movement, for his tendency to coquette with the themes, to turn the frank allegro of Beethoven into that nauseous thing, "a slow allegro," a thing especially dear to certain Viennese, a thing beloved by certain Brahmsites. It is true that Beethoven indicated an "allegro moderato," but this pace is difficult from the "slow allegro" with the suggestion of a constant desire to sentimentalize, to weep, to make the music "too beautiful." Mr. Dohnányi did not allow this tendency to get wholly the better of him, but the performance as a whole would have gained if he had shown more absolute frankness in this movement.

There is no need of speaking at length about his technic. It was always ample, fluent, thoroughly under control, never obtrusive. His touch was agreeable, and if you found that he was not a distinguished colorist, you should remember that the concerto itself does not call for the nuances indispensable to modern music—and when I say modern I of course include Chopin, whose music might have been written yesterday by a radical—instead of "yesterday" I almost wrote "tomorrow." It was an eminently polished, thoughtful, musical performance.

It was a pity that he did not choose his own concerto, the one that won the prize at Vienna; for then we might have had an opportunity of judging of his own individuality. With the exception of the wonderfully impressive second movement, this concerto of Beethoven contains little of real interest. There are few reminders of the great Beethoven. And in this second movement Mr. Dohnányi did not rise to a great height, as did d'Albert on a memorable occasion in this city. Here was Mr. Dohnányi's one opportunity to reveal a powerful, intense, masterful individuality. The music was there; the opportunity was there; the pianist was, as ever, polished, musical—and that was all.

Whether this agreeable pianist has a decided individuality, whether he has temperament, great moments, fire that illuminates but not consumes—this can be answered only after he has been heard in compositions of another nature and another period.

***

An unfamiliar symphony by Mozart is in nine cases out of ten a weariness to the flesh, and it is mistaken reverence to exhume it with the intention of galvanizing it. Better one strong modern work than a wilderness of symphonies of ancient pattern and conventional manufacture. The one chosen last night has interesting passages, especially in the finale. The middle movements are dull, and Mozart himself, if he were living, would be the first to yawn at them.

I wonder what he would say to Richard Strauss's smyphonic poem. It was Mr. James Huneker who said that this piece should be played to an audience composed exclusively of poets, musicians and mad-men. Pages have been written about the music, and extravagant language has been used in praise and disapproval. The opening measures are sublime—it is as though the doors of eternity were opened, slowly and solemnly by unseen hands. But a few sublime pages do not make a sublime composition, especially when it goes on for half an hour or more. There is a wealth of beauty and strength in this strange fantasia, and there are pages that are curious rather than clear or satisfying. The dissonances do not offend so much as does the obscurity in which the composer's meaning is sometimes hidden. Nor again would the obscurity irritate or perplex if by it any definite mood were established. The fugued passage entitled "Of Science" is a case in point; is it merely an intimation of the vanity of pedantry? But how beautiful, on the other hand, is the music that follows immediately the stroke of midnight! The establishment of two tonalities at the very close is not as disconcerting as is the manner in which the closing measures are treated in harmonic progression and orchestrally just before the establishment of these conflicting tonalities. And on many a page you feel the want of a deep-root-

[illegible] "Remember?" [illegible] been performed in Chicago [illegible] has made its way [illegible] Germany and the Netherlands; it has reached Switzerland, and it has been played in Paris.

The performance last night of this stupendous work was interesting, often impressive. The wretched box of whistles was inadequate in the opening measures, and this whole passage was more overwhelming when it was heard here before. There were some instances of false intonation; the violin solo might well have been taken at a faster pace; and the final passages for the wood wind were breathy and not rigidly precise. But these were little spots in the splendor of the performance, and the technical difficulties are great.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The young Hungarian pianist, Ernst von Dohnanyi, made his first appearance in this city at the symphony concerts last week, playing Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto. The remaining program numbers included Mozart's C major symphony, the Richard Strauss symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and the overture to Weber's "Oberon." Young Dohnanyi has attracted great attention abroad, both as a pianist and composer, and to judge by his performance of the Beethoven concerto the praises awarded him as a pianist were merited. In connection with his career as a composer it is pertinent to say that the present leader of our symphony orchestra, Mr Gericke, was one of the judges who, in 1898, at Vienna, awarded to von Dohnanyi first prize for the best pianoforte concerto written in memory of Hans von Buelow. Mr Dohnanyi is evidently about 22 years old, rather slight in physique, modest in demeanor and without any marked personal characteristics. His attitude at the piano is graceful and there is but the slightest appearance of physical exertion shown by him in any part of his performance. In short, his manner is without ostentation and is calculated to make a favorable impression at once, and certainly his work emphasizes his right to consideration more than favorable. He appears to be an artist whose reputation has been honestly won and that conscientious work allied with great natural gifts have produced results which have already placed the young artist in the foremost ranks of his chosen profession.

The Beethoven concerto offers but few chances for brilliant work by the soloist, the composition being of a character which, although masterly in construction, is somewhat severe and treats the solo instrument in the main as a concomitant of the orchestra and not as a principal factor with an orchestral background. It may be said at the outset, though, that Mr Dohnanyi's interpretation was most effective and that at no time did he endeavor to individualize the subordinate piano part unless the score so indicated. His technique is brilliant, his rapid finger work, especially in the running passages for the left hand, was crisp and beautifully defined and in the dynamic variety there was little to be desired in the way of color. His fortissimo never degenerated into pounding and his cantabile phrasing was of a quality delightfully delicate and pleasing. Chord passages and double runs were played with equal skill; in fact he seems to be equal to nearly every requirement of a composition, even in those in which the demands are heavier and more varied than in the Beethoven work. Mr Dohnanyi's introduced cadenza gave pleasing evidence of his equipment for lighter work and it is to be hoped that the artist will give a recital here that a better judgment may be formed of his abilities. He was most enthusiastically received, being recalled to the platform a half dozen times.

The orchestra played the Beethoven number in splendid form and also displayed the same remarkable quality of team work in the Mozart symphony, a contrasting style of writing which calls for a brilliancy and daintiness of treatment not found in the more stately concerto. The Strauss poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," may suit some musical enthusiasts who delight in this skilful arrangement of dissonants and cross harmonies, but it is merely a musical curio to the average concert patron who doubtless wishes that "Zarathustra" spake more melodiously and briefly. The charming "Oberon" overture was played faultlessly.

The next concerts will take place March 30 and 31, the orchestra being away during the coming week. Mme Marie Brema will be the soloist next week, singing the Saint-Saens aria, "La Fiancee du Timbalier" and "Schmetzen" and "Traume," by Wagner. The balance of the program will comprise the overture to "Alphonso and Estrella," by Schubert; Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

ON SUNDAY POST,
MARCH 18, 1900.

The De Pachmann-Marteau Recital.

The joint appearance of Mr. Vladimir de Pachmann, the great pianist, and Mr. Henri Marteau, the famous violinist, announced under the management of L. H. Mudgett, at Music Hall on Thursday and Saturday afternoons of the coming week, promises to make a notable event in the season's musical attractions. The popularity of both these musicians with Boston audiences is unquestioned, and the attractive programme arranged will undoubtedly result in the attendance of great audiences upon both occasions.

At the Thursday recital the programme will include the Mozart sonata in E minor and Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata for the two artists, with a group of Chopin's numbers for M. De Pachmann and selections by Bach, Sjogren and Wieniawski for M. Marteau. The programme for the Saturday recital will have for its duet Schumann's sonata in D minor, op. 121, and the Schubert fantasie, Op. 159. In this programme M. De Pachmann will play the "Perpe twun Mobile," by Weber, and some Chopin numbers, and M. Marteau will play Christian Sinding's "Quatre Morceaux," Op. 43, dedicated to Mr. Marteau by the composer. A popular scale of prices has been arranged for these recitals.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAR. 19, 1900.

Dohnanyi, Pianist—Strauss' "Zarathustra."

The great orchestral number of Saturday's concert was Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra" ("Thus spake Zarathustra"); the programme began, however, with "Also sprach Mozart," and the speech of the last-named was much more intelligible than the metaphysics of the founder of Zoroastrianism. It was a Mozart symphony in C that began the concert; not the great "Jupiter" symphony, yet not so very far behind it either.

It received a perfect performance and it inculcated the lesson that there was once a time when beauty, symmetry and melody existed in music, an epoch when almost everybody could understand what was performed. The dainty little canon in the Trio of the Minuet presented counterpoint of a very different order from that which came later; only the finale of the symphony seemed a trifle weak in its conventional gaiety, a well-bred hilarity which is always present in the old symphony finale and is as fixed as the smile of a ballet-girl.

Enter Dohnanyi and Beethoven's piano concerto in G major! We of Boston are well acquainted with this fourth concerto, the gentle sister of the imperious fifth, for Prof. Baermann has played it to us more than once and D'Albert has also won success here with the work. It is a good test of musicianship in a pianist, for one must steer between the temptation to aggrandize the subtle effects, on the one hand, and the desire to sentimentalize, on the other.

Mr. Dohnanyi kept the true artistic path; at first there was a tendency to overclearness which led to a non-legato that was almost a staccato, but this soon wore away. There was plenty of technique in the performance but it was always subjugated to the ensemble, it was never thrust into unfitting prominence.

The cadenza in the first movement (Mr. Dohnanyi's own composition) was well developed from the themes, and was not too showy for the delicate concerto. By the end of the first movement one felt sure that a new artist of high rank had come to us.

The slow movement erred a little on the side of reserve. It is one of the softest movements in the entire repertoire, a movement in which it is impossible to over-use the soft pedal. The orchestra was tempered to the whispered phrases, and the ensemble was something that the players could well be proud of. Yet we have heard better effect made with this movement. The final rondo, however, was splendidly played, with a sufficient amount of verve and abandon. Again the cadenza was the work of the pianist himself. It was scarcely as fine a production as the first one, nor was Beethoven's injunction, "La Cadenza sia corta,"—quite obeyed.

We hope to see the time when the cadenza shall be banished from the concerto. Established by Mozart, who was always ready to concede chances for personal display to the artist, the cadenza almost always runs the risk of disturbing the continuity of the work. That Beethoven commanded it to be short here, is a straw showing the direction of the wind; in his next concerto we find the solo cadenza forbidden (in the first movement), and a brilliant climax for piano and orchestra introduced in its stead, a sort of ensemble cadenza. We find Brahms viewing it with distrust, and even Mendelssohn transferring it to the middle of the movement (in his violin concerto), in constant dread of the cadenza degenerating into a mere triumph of technique and individual display.

Mr. Dohnanyi deserves credit for the manner in which he avoided this fault in the construction, and the performance of his two cadenzas. In this, as in every other direction, he showed himself to be a true musician. He was recalled again and again at the close of the performance. We must hear more of this pianist; he is one of the really important players of the present time.

And now Zarathustra was unchained! Never has the stupendous work received so fine a reading: Mr. Gericke and each of his men may take a personal pride in the result attained; we frankly doubt whether the complicated composition has ever been heard anywhere to such good advantage.

Richard Strauss has proved Wagner in the wrong; instrumental music has not yet reached its limits; the scoring and the treatment of themes go beyond what was deemed possible in 1883 (the year of Wagner's death), but it is difficult to see how anything can be added to the orchestra of the future, unless we join locomotives and fire engines to the forces. Far be it from us to sneer or jest at such a work; agree with it or not, it compels respect; genius flares forth even in its opening measures. Once upon a time the opening measures (trombone chords) of Mozart's "Requiem" were held to be as solemn a beginning as could be imagined; if those measures opened the gates of the tomb, then here the gates of eternity swing upon their hinges.

But is such a metaphysical work properly within the domain of music? Is that true music which demands a pre-study of a mystic's volume and a knowledge of Zoroaster, Ormuzd and Ahriman? We cannot deny that we were profoundly moved by the composition and that we found in it some points of ineffable beauty. Here is the one man, among the ultra-moderns, who has something to say, and when he says it, Bruckner, Vincent d'Indy, and the whole tribe of cacophonists shrivel up. But what could Strauss bring to Art if he became a pre-Wagnerian? If Saul became Paul, what glories might be expected!

In this work one is placed in a tropical jungle of figures and themes and it is almost impossible to find the beginning and end of any one of them. A beautiful thought begins—it is labelled "Of Joys and Passions"—it is overwhelmed before it reaches anything like maturity; a strange, passionless theme follows, chiefly upon the violins, which seem to indicate that Zoroaster sought Nirvana, a la Buddha, but this too is very soon crushed out; a dancing theme is quite definite, and dainty enough too, but this also is swallowed in the maelstrom of orchestration and of vague progressions; a frenzied fugal passage is ticketed "Of Science," but science seems to discover nothing more than a swarm of crickets merrily chirping on the piccolos; a bell tolls midnight, and a host of strange, fantastical ideas are woven around it; and finally matters end in two different keys, to show that all human wisdom leads but to uncertainty. Can Music tell so definite a story? If so we may yet hope for a symphony on integral calculus and a sonata on Kantian transcendentalism.

Great applause followed the performance, the audience appreciating the wonders of the interpretation and palpably complimenting the conductor and the orchestra upon the successful completion of a herculean task.

It was well to give something shapely after this musical problem; if the audience had been dismissed after the final mixture of the keys of B major and C major (also endet Zarathustra!) few of them would have been able to find their way home. Weber's "Oberon" overture gave them a firm foothold again; but we must confess it sounded mighty tame. Even the heavy chord of the first part, held to be one of the most explosive effects in music, seemed gentle and mild, and although the clarinette played beautifully, its tootlings sounded conventional after the flammivomous work which preceded it. The Russians sometimes end a wild banquet by pouring all the liquors left at table, into a large bowl, adding a couple of bottles of brandy, setting the whole on fire, and then drinking their final toasts in this strong brew. If any one introduces this Russian Punch into Music it will be Richard Strauss.

Louis C. Elson.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813

March 17

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the nineteenth rehearsal and concert of the Symphony orchestra was:

Symphony No. 36, C major.........Mozart.
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, G major, op. 58.........................Beethoven.
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," op. 30.........Richard Strauss.
Overture to "Oberon".............Weber.
Soloist, Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi.

This was a most interesting concert, and in Mr. Dohnanyi the music-loving public heard a thorough artist, even though as yet he is not the faultless master. The selecting of the Beethoven concerto shows the metal of which he is made and his interpretation of it the high quality of his talents.. It was an interpretation without a trace of sentimental morbidness in it; a frank, manly interpretation, played in a large, free style and with a rare and unexpected deference to the intentions of the composer. Perfection was not reached, but that is simply a question of time; the full opening of the flower now in healthy and most promising bud. The artist made no attempt to cast his shadow on the composer; nor did he intrude his personality on the audience by affectation of manner or of style. Technically, his equipment is of the best; he has, as might be expected well educated and trained fingers, and what is more creditable the tones they produce are most pleasing in quality. He never uses the too frequent trick of "pounding," nor the equally frequent trick of contrasting whispering pianissimo with string-splitting fortissimo; he does not avoid mezzo piano as if it were the plague, nor use his arm as a blacksmith's hammer. All that he does is artistic; he has intelligence, taste and feeling and he keeps them all on this side of morbidness. The work he performed is deserving of very high and unstinted praise and he had the effect of all round artistic work in his audience, rousing them into spontaneous enthusiasm and compelling the young man to appear again and again to bow his thanks.

Particular praise is due to Mr. Gericke for the masterly manner in which he read the Strauss work; a reading that brought meaning and order out of seeming chaos and allowed one to appreciate the beauties of a work that has probably been underestimated. There was no world-splitting tempest in Mr. Gericke's reading; there were fine gradations of coloring, and fine shades of contrast, and the ideas of the composer could be followed in all their complex development. It was a noble reading of a most original and impressive work, and it was played with rare brilliancy and finish by the orchestra.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 18, 1900.
(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The nineteenth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. The soloist was the Hungarian pianist, Ernst Von Dohnanyi.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1900.

DOHNANYI

A Pianist That Is Also a Musician.

R. Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

An Unfamiliar Symphony Contrast.

The program of the 19th Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Symphony, C major, 425................Mozart
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major.. .... Beethoven
Cadenzas by Mr. Dohnanyi.
Symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," ....Richard Strauss
Overture to "Oberon,"...................Weber

Mr. Ernest von Dohnányi made his first appearance in Boston last night. His first appearance in this country was at the Symphony concert Thursday night at Cambridge.

The young pianist is first of all a musician; not because he composed his own cadenzas to the concerto, for these cadenzas are by no means distinguished—they are in fact, respectable and ineffective, as though the composer had been afraid of doing something that would seem ahead of Beethoven's period, and thus they were merely diluted spirits of Beethoven; not because he wrote these cadenzas, I repeat, but because throughout the concerto he proved himself an admirable musician in the essential qualities; in firm grasp of the composer's ideas, in sense of proportion, in beauty of phrasing. He understood the music and he reproduced it as only an accomplished musician can interpret.

I am aware that exception might be taken to his treatment of the first movement, for his tendency to coquette with the themes, to turn the frank allegro of Beethoven into that nauseous thing, "a slow allegro," a thing especially dear to certain Viennese, a thing beloved by certain Brahmsites. It is true that Beethoven indicated an "allegro moderato," but this pace is difficult from the "slow allegro" with the suggestion of a constant desire to sentimentalize, to weep, to make the music "too beautiful." Mr. Dohnányi did not allow this tendency to get wholly the better of him, but the performance as a whole would have gained if he had shown more absolute frankness in this movement.

There is no need of speaking at length about his technic. It was always ample, fluent, thoroughly under control, never obtrusive. His touch was agreeable, and if you found that he was not a distinguished colorist, you should remember that the concerto itself does not call for the nuances indispensable to modern music—and when I say modern I of course include Chopin, whose music might have been written yesterday by a radical—instead of "yesterday" I almost wrote "tomorrow." It was an eminently polished, thoughtful, musical performance.

It was a pity that he did not choose his own concerto, the one that won the prize at Vienna; for then we might have had an opportunity of judging of his own individuality. With the exception of the wonderfully impressive second movement, this concerto of Beethoven contains little of real interest. There are few reminders of the great Beethoven. And in this second movement Mr. Dohnányi did not rise to a great height, as did d'Albert on a memorable occasion in this city. Here was Mr. Dohnányi's one opportunity to reveal a powerful, intense, masterful individuality. The music was there; the opportunity was there; the pianist was, as ever, polished, musical—and that was all.

Whether this agreeable pianist has a decided individuality, whether he has temperament, great moments, fire that illuminates but not consumes—this can be answered only after he has been heard in compositions of another nature and another period.

⁂

An unfamiliar symphony by Mozart is in nine cases out of ten a weariness to the flesh, and it is mistaken reverence to exhume it with the intention of galvanizing it. Better one strong modern work than a wilderness of symphonies of ancient pattern and conventional manufacture. The one chosen last night has interesting passages, especially in the finale. The middle movements are dull, and Mozart himself, if he were living, would be the first to yawn at them.

I wonder what he would say to Richard Strauss's smyphonic poem. It was Mr. James Huneker who said that this piece should be played to an audience composed exclusively of poets, musicians and mad-men. Pages have been written about the music, and extravagant language has been used in praise and disapproval. The opening measures are sublime—it is as though the doors of eternity were opened, slowly and solemnly by unseen hands. But a few sublime pages do not make a sublime composition, especially when it goes on for half an hour or more. There is a wealth of beauty and strength in this strange fantasia, and there are pages that are curious rather than clear or satisfying. The dissonances do not offend so much as does the obscurity in which the composer's meaning is sometimes hidden. Nor again would the obscurity irritate or perplex if by it any definite mood were established. The fugued passage entitled "Of Science" is a case in point; is it merely an intimation of the vanity of pedantry? But how beautiful, on the other hand, is the music that follows immediately the stroke of midnight! The establishment of two tonalities at the very close is not as disconcerting as is the manner in which the closing measures are treated in harmonic progression and orchestrally just before the establishment of these conflicting tonalities. And on many a page you feel the want of a deep-rooted, firmly grounded [illegible] and beauty, [illegible] now, Mr. Gericke, why should we not hear Strauss's "Don Quixote" and "Ein Heldenleben?" They have both been performed in Chicago, and the latter has made its way throughout Germany and the Netherlands; it has reached Switzerland, and it has been played in Paris.

The performance last night of this stupendous work was interesting, often impressive. The wretched box of whistles was inadequate in the opening measures, and this whole passage was more overwhelming when it was heard here before. There were some instances of false intonation; the violin solo might well have been taken at a faster pace; and the final passages for the wood wind were breathy and not rigidly precise. But these were little spots in the splendor of the performance, and the technical difficulties are great.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The young Hungarian pianist, Ernst von Dohnanyi, made his first appearance in this city at the symphony concerts last week, playing Beethoven's fourth pianoforte concerto. The remaining program numbers included Mozart's C major symphony, the Richard Strauss symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and the overture to Weber's "Oberon." Young Dohnanyi has attracted great attention abroad, both as a pianist and composer, and to judge by his performance of the Beethoven concerto the praises awarded him as a pianist were merited. In connection with his career as a composer it is pertinent to say that the present leader of our symphony orchestra, Mr Gericke, was one of the judges who, in 1898, at Vienna, awarded to von Dohnanyi first prize for the best pianoforte concerto written in memory of Hans von Buelow. Mr Dohnanyi is evidently about 22 years old, rather slight in physique, modest in demeanor and without any marked personal characteristics. His attitude at the piano is graceful and there is but the slightest appearance of physical exertion shown by him in any part of his performance. In short, his manner is without ostentation and is calculated to make a favorable impression at once, and certainly his work emphasizes his right to consideration more than favorable. He appears to be an artist whose reputation has been honestly won and that conscientious work allied with great natural gifts have produced results which have already placed the young artist in the foremost ranks of his chosen profession.

The Beethoven concerto offers but few chances for brilliant work by the soloist, the composition being of a character which, although masterly in construction, is somewhat severe and treats the solo instrument in the main as a concomitant of the orchestra and not as a principal factor with an orchestral background. It may be said at the outset, though, that Mr Dohnanyi's interpretation was most effective and that at no time did he endeavor to individualize the subordinate piano part unless the score so indicated. His technique is brilliant, his rapid finger work, especially in the running passages for the left hand, was crisp and beautifully defined and in the dynamic variety there was little to be desired in the way of color. His fortissimo never degenerated into pounding and his cantabile phrasing was of a quality delightfully delicate and pleasing. Chord passages and double runs were played with equal skill; in fact he seems to be equal to nearly every requirement of a composition, even in those in which the demands are heavier and more varied than in the Beethoven work. Mr Dohnanyi's introduced cadenza gave pleasing evidence of his equipment for lighter work and it is to be hoped that the artist will give a recital here that a better judgment may be formed of his abilities. He was most enthusiastically received, being recalled to the platform a half dozen times.

The orchestra played the Beethoven number in splendid form and also displayed the same remarkable quality of team work in the Mozart symphony, a contrasting style of writing which calls for a brilliancy and daintiness of treatment not found in the more stately concerto. The Strauss poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," may suit some musical enthusiasts who delight in this skilful arrangement of dissonants and cross harmonies, but it is merely a musical curio to the average concert patron who doubtless wishes that "Zarathustra" spake more melodiously and briefly. The charming "Oberon" overture was played faultlessly.

The next concerts will take place March 30 and 31, the orchestra being away during the coming week. Mme Marie Brema will be the soloist next week, singing the Saint-Saens aria, "La Fiancee du Timbalier" and "Schmetzen" and "Traume," by Wagner. The balance of the program will comprise the overture to "Alphonso and Estrella," by Schubert; Grieg's suite, "Peer Gynt" and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony.

ON SUNDAY POST,
MARCH 18, 1900.

The De Pachmann-Marteau Recital.

The joint appearance of Mr. Vladimir De Pachmann, the great pianist, and Mr. Henri Marteau, the famous violinist, announced under the management of L. H. Mudgett, at Music Hall on Thursday and Saturday afternoons of the coming week, promises to make a notable event in the season's musical attractions. The popularity of both these musicians with Boston audiences is unquestioned, and the attractive programme arranged will undoubtedly result in the attendance of great audiences upon both occasions.

At the Thursday recital the programme will include the Mozart sonata in E minor and Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata for the two artists, with a group of Chopin's numbers for M. De Pachmann and selections by Bach, Sjogren and Wieniawski for M. Marteau. The programme for the Saturday recital will have for its duet Schumann's sonata in D minor, op. 121, and the Schubert fantasie, Op. 159. In this programme M. De Pachmann will play the "Perpe twun Mobile," by Weber, and some Chopin numbers, and M. Marteau will play Christian Sinding's "Quatre Morceaux," Op. 43, dedicated to Mr. Marteau by the composer. A popular scale of prices has been arranged for these recitals.

S[illegible] HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII, NO. 77.

SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mozart Symphony Is Given a Charming Interpretation.

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the Young Hungarian Pianist, Scores a Brilliant Success in His Playing of the Beethoven Concerto—He Is Given Four Recalls.

For the 19th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, the programme was:

Symphony No. 36, in C major..........Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major ....Beethoven
"Thus Spake Zarathustra"..........R. Strauss
Overture to "Oberon"..........Weber

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist, was the soloist.

The Mozart symphony, after the three great ones in E flat, G minor and the "Jupiter," is prominent among the master's best works of this description. Its lovely adagio and its solid, exquisitely melodious and beautifully worked-out finale, of themselves give it a special distinction. It was accorded a perfect reading by Mr. Gericke, the slow movement escaping the dragging pace at which it is usually taken, and the presto the over-rapid hurry-scurry. It was a charmingly colored and sensitively sympathetic interpretation, from beginning to end.

The Strauss Symphonic Poem as presented on this occasion was less noisy, less wild and whirring than it seemed to be at its earlier performances, and under the treatment it received generally, more clear, and perhaps on the whole more sane; but it still remains a severe tax on the understanding, and makes a cruel demand, on the patience of the listener. It is probable that if Zarathustra had not spoken so much, and had been a trifle more intelligible, he might have appealed more directly to the sympathies; but, as it is, he seems to have indulged in garrulity over nothing of vital moment, as far as music is competent to express his utterances. Nietzsche's book of itself is something of a subtle puzzle, and its solution is not simplified by translating it into tone color. Of splendid orchestration, ingenious and effective contrapuntal devices, massively rich effects, daring harmonies there is an abundance, in fact, a superabundance, but most of it is ugly, and consequently at variance with the well-founded principle that claims for high art a devotion to the beautiful.

It is hardly wise to pass an adverse judgment on the music of the end of the century extremists, for as time passes it may turn out that this work is devoted to the beautiful, after all, and is overflowing with a charm that the future will make clear. One becomes accustomed to everything through prolonged acquaintance with it—even misery. All that the opponent of this latter day music is safe in saying of it is that he does not like it. He may be pitied by those who do like it, or who pretend to, but he is standing on firm ground, for he cannot be contradicted. Moreover, he leaves himself an opportunity to make the amende honorable, if ever the time should come around when what now excites distaste will be as the honey of Hybla in his mouth. However, there is and can be nothing but admiration for the judgment shown by Mr. Gericke in reading the work, and for the magnificent virtuosity of the orchestra in the easy smoothness with which it mastered its tremendous difficulties in the performance.

Mr. Dohnanyi made a brilliant success in his playing of the Beethoven concerto. What was particularly delightful in his playing was its freedom from all empty display and its devotion to the music instead of exemplifying his skill in finger gymnastics. He has a beautiful touch, a solid and brilliant technique, the refined taste of an innate artist and an exceptional respect for the instrument to which he has devoted himself. There is no pounding of it, no attempt to force its tone, none of the thousand and one tricks to which of late we have been so accustomed.

So discreet is he in his treatment of it, so quietly and modestly does he acquit himself at it, that those who hear with their eyes are very liable to fall short in due appreciation of the exquisite musicianly qualities of his playing, for firstly and lastly the work of this young artist shows him to be a musician by instinct, to whom his fingers are merely a means to an end, instead of the end itself. There is not a trace of the sickly sentimentality, the posing and the bidding for applause by a sacrifice of his artistic conscience that have carried so many of our visiting pianists to the height of popularity.

His reading of the noble concerto was free from any seeking after new readings, was logical, sympathetic, refined in conception and charming in phrasing and tone color; and in its technical presentation was fairly fascinating. The performance, it is true, shared the artist's individuality, but this in no wise did injustice to the composer.

In brief, Mr. Dohnanyi made it evident that he is already among the foremost of living pianists, with a strong promise of still greater possibilities before him. By the time that the first movement of the concerto was over, his success was assured, and at its close there was a storm of applause and four recalls for him. A word of warm praise is due the two brilliant cadenzas composed by the artist for the concerto, and for the excellent judgment with which they were kept in harmony with the spirit of the work. Nor must Mr. Gericke's treatment of the orchestral score be passed by without an acknowledgment of its felicitous skill.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Alfonso and Estrella," Schubert; Aria, "La Fiancee du Timbalier," Saint-Saens; Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Schmerzen" and "Traume," Wagner, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. Mme. Marie Brema is to be the soloist.

[illegible] patrons of the Symphony [illegible], who were kept at home by the rain of the early morning, lost the sensation of the winter. There were many vacant seats at last Friday's concert, but the enthusiasm aroused by the young soloist was none the less warm for that. Indeed, it was at the boiling point, and this boy with the unpronounceable name was applauded without stint. Any hope of compelling an encore was squelched by Mr. Gericke, who shook his head at his young friend, who was quite willing to respond to the clamor. Though encores at these concerts are not countenanced, here was a case where the exception might have proved the rule. But we shall hope to hear Ernst von Dohnanyi again. And to think, this youthful artist wears his brown hair the regulation length and looks like any other nice boy without a particle of affectation. Oh, girls, you don't know what you missed Friday!

Mr. and Mrs. Gericke asked a few musical people to meet Herr von Dohnanyi at luncheon Thursday. The celebrated young pianist made a close calculation when he arrived on the Oceanic Wednesday, came over from New York on the 3 P. M. train that afternoon, and rehearsed and played at Sanders Theatre at the Thursday concert for his American debut. At the rehearsal and concert Friday, and last night Herr von Dohnanyi made a distinctly fine impression. For the 20th rehearsal and concert Mme. Marie Brema will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. MARCH 17, 1900.

Mr. Gericke included novelty in his nineteenth Symphony programme; however it was not new music, but a new musician, that he introduced—the pianist, Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, who repeated in Boston, Beethoven's fourth concerto, in G major, wherein he had already made an excellent impression at Sanders Theatre on the preceding Thursday evening. This young man of two or three and twenty had the advantage of presenting himself with far more commendation for serious merit and sober studies (as well in composition as in performance) than as a virtuoso.

There have been displayed of late, and by so many players, the superabundance of technique, amazing and really confounding velocity, tremendous tone volume, dazzling brilliancy or startling originality of phrase and interpretation, that it is a pleasure and a relief to receive some one whose first thought and intention apparently are to present his chosen music sensibly, clearly, and respectfully—to neglect nothing in art or mechanism which can contribute to such a result, but to hold all such elements in abeyance when they are not needed for this purpose.

The cadenzas composed by Mr. Dohnanyi were finely conceived, and beautifully executed; and were not, as sometimes happens, extraneous ornaments, foreign to the spirit of the work. His presentation of the concerto revealed a true artistic perception, and sympathetic feeling. He was most enthusiastically received and recalled many times.

The concert began as with an exhilarating fresh breeze by a delightfully airy and enlivening performance of Mozart's symphony in C major, which was an admirable choice for the first number, considering what serious matters were immediately to follow. The end of the evening came with Weber's "Oberon" overture, whose dreamy beauty, far-away fancies and lovely play of instrumentation came cool and soothing after the strange, yet impressive and exciting pages of Richard Strauss, which had immediately preceded. For the third number was a repetition of that weird, wild and almost inexplicable "Thus spake Zarathustra," whose intrinsic power proved no less dominant than at the first hearing, which won evidently even a greater appreciation and admiration, and yet remained mystical and perplexing to the end, and left a great proportion of the listeners in doubt as to how they might match the orphic utterances of the prophet to the grandiose and intensely colored music.

It was read by Mr. Gericke (who evidently has a keen grasp of its subtle meanings as well as liking for its original and complicated tone schemes) in a grand style, and from the deep organ chord of the beginning to the mysterious pizzicato of the basses at the close, it held the listener in an almost hypnotic state of interest. Yet, what did Zarathustra say and mean?

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1900.

The peerless Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in New York Thursday afternoon, and, according to the New York Sun, "the attendance was small enough to suggest that New York might not, after all, be a city that takes much pleasure in concerts." No; the New Yorkers prefer the opera, where they can compare jewels and converse without the slightest interruption from the music.

MR. SAVAGE DENIES IT.

Mr. Henry W. Savage, the agent for the present owners of the Boston Music Hall property, denies that it has been purchased by Mr. Rollin H. Allen for a vaudeville entertainment house.

[illegible] 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Mozart: Symphony No. 36, in C major (Koechel, No. 425).
Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58.
Richard Strauss: Symphonic Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," opus 30.
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi was the pianist.

The Mozart symphony has not been heard here for a good many years. One is somewhat surprised to find Otto Jahn saying of it that it "bears traces of Haydn's influence, direct and indirect." That anything in the symphonic form, written in Austria in 1783 by Mozart or anyone else, should "bear traces of Haydn's influence" might be taken for granted, for Haydn virtually dominated the whole style at that period. But this particular symphony seems the last one would have picked out to make the remark about, for what Haydn influence is to be described in it is enormously overshadowed by Mozart's own personality. The work is full of that peculiarly Mozartian idiom which we find in its most familiar type in "Don Giovanni;" almost throughout the symphony you can hear the Don, Zerlina and Masetto singing gleefully "Ed a ballar cogli altri andiamo tutti tre!" It is a delightful work, and was most admirably played.

And we have heard Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra" again! This stupendous composition becomes more and more interesting. To be sure, there is much in it which still repells, much that one cannot yet understand and like. But we should remember that, thirty years ago, Wagner's "Tristan" sounded much the same, and, fifty years ago, Schumann's B-flat variations for two pianofortes seemed no clearer. "Zarathustra" is still considerably "in the future." But even now it takes a certain wilful blindness not to see that Strauss has something to say here, and says it with enormous force. I have heard people say that they could recognize a good half of Wagner in this "Zarathustra;" but I cannot. Save for one motive that reminds one of something in the "Holländer," I can find nothing distinctively Wagnerian in the work; if it comes to picking out suggestive likenesses, I find more of Donizetti and Verdi (of all people in the world!) than of Wagner. It all seems very original to me, very Straussian and little else.

What tremendous power there is in that exordium! I can recall nothing else in all music so thoroughly enharmonic as that C minor chord, coming between the two chords of C major. In enharmonic harmony a chord is usually either one thing or another, the ear cannot tell which, until the resolution comes; but the ear immediately feels this C minor chord to be both things at once; the "questionable note" is heard as E-flat and D-sharp at the same time, and the ear grasps both significances. You cannot help recognizing it as essentially chromatic (with a D-sharp), and yet you get the whole minor effect of an E-flat!

Then that whole passage "Of the Dwellers in the Rear World;" what a transcendently powerful expression it is of what I will call popular religious feeling! It is the apotheosis of the sentimental psalm-tune. It has its vulgar side—approaching the vulgarity of the "Handel Largo" in the contrast between a portentous volume of tone and the sugared sentimentalism of the theme—and this is perhaps why it seems to me an expression of "popular" religiosity; so patent is this that one would like to know Strauss better, to be sure whether the whole passage is meant seriously or ironically. But there is an enormous amount of beauty in it, notwithstanding. The fugato "Of Science" grows upon one; a most curious piece of writing, a square slap in the face of all one's notions of counterpoint. Here is something new in music—a fugued passage that is to a great extent intrinsically unpolyphonic! Strauss seems to have thought out a series of dissonant harmonies in an entirely homophonic way; and then let his fugal parts climb round from chord to chord, generally picking out the dissonant notes, without regard for the contrapuntal relations of one part to another. It is applying en gros the system applied by Wagner, in a smaller way, in his terrific "Ew'ge Nacht, süsse Nacht!" in the second act of "Tristan und Isolde"—where the harmony is perfectly logical homophonically, but the voice-parts go skipping from 7th to 7th. After all, it is only the ruthlessness with which this idea is carried out that is really new; you can find in some of Schumann's fugal writing (and for chorus, too—see passages in the closing chorus of the first part of "Paradise and the Peri") where what the lowest voice sings is not a real bass, harmonically speaking, but only a phrase transposed from the top to the bottom of the harmony, in defiance of every principle of double counterpoint. And, with Strauss, the general cacophonous effect comes more from his recklessly illogical use of passing-notes than from the peculiar system I have mentioned. I am not at all sure, by the way, that his daringly illogical passing-notes are harsher to the ear than some of Sebastian Bach's perfectly logical ones; I know of an orchestral Adagio of Bach's where (counting from the bass upward) the notes A-flat, C, F-sharp, A-natural, B, D, G come together; Strauss cannot do worse than that, as my own ears can testify!

I have got over my distaste for the ending in two keys; musically it is nonsense, if you will, but the mystical poetic suggestion can pardon it; only the scoring of the high B major chords sounds to me terribly cold and thin. Strauss, by the way, once made a joke about this passage himself; when rehearsing the work in Cologne, he said to the orchestra: "Gentlemen, I have had to write these C's for the 'celli and basses, because the 'cello does not go down to B."

The performance was wonderfully fine and euphonious, full of delicacy, vigor and power. Perhaps it may be even improved upon in years to come; it is hard to tell now whether the composer really loses his way at moments, or whether the fault lies in the playing. But in [illegible] formance as Mr. Gericke and the orchestra gave last Saturday can only be called a triumph.

Of all orchestral compositions in the world, probably the fittest to follow immediately after Strauss's "Zaranthustra" is Weber's overture to "Oberon." No more refreshing contrast could be imagined. The overture was played to perfection, wonderfully!

Mr. von Dohnanyi made an exceedingly deep, fine and dignified impression with his playing of Beethoven's G major concerto. Only in the first movement did I find some things not to like. It seems to me that the profound soulfulness of this movement strikes deeper into the heart when not quite so heavily underscored; the pianist's very slow tempo was already a little over-sentimental, and every now and then he evinced a tendency rather to "rub it in." His playing of the second movement, however, was so essentially poetic that one could forgive his disregard for Beethoven's directions and expression-marks; he made a beautiful poem out of it in his own way. In the final rondo he was admirable at every point. Upon the whole one seldom hears so fine a performance of this concerto. Mr. von Dohnanyi played his own cadenzas, admirably written, with all due "piety," and sufficiently brilliant. He was loudly applauded and recalled. Here is a pianist from whom one would fain hear more; one who seems to have had a hand in building up his own reputation, and not left it wholly to the passionate press-agent.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 30, and Saturday evening, March 31 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Schubert, overture to "Alfonso und Estrella;" Saint-Saëns, aria, "La fiancée du timbalieu;" Grieg, suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt," opus 46; Wagner, songs with pianoforte, "Schmerzen" and "Träume;" Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56. Mme. Marie Brema will be the singer.

W. F. A.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1900

NO THEATRE IN MUSIC HALL

Henry W. Savage Contradicts the Report That It Is to Be Turned into a Vaudeville House—No Intention of Establishing Permanent Opera in Boston

Henry W. Savage has requested the Transcript to correct the unauthorized and contradictory series of statements that appeared in a Boston marning paper today respecting the Music Hall property, of which he is the official agent. He says:

"The purchase of the old Music Hall was made on Feb. 8, 1899, more than a year ago, by a syndicate, which I represent, and of which Rollin H. Allen is simply one member. It was a real estate transaction pure and simple, as the property is in the market and can be purchased today.

Mr. Allen has never had a plan of securing a license for himself, or of running a vaudeville entertainment in conjunction with the sale of drinks. He has not been in New York consulting with me on this matter, but has been in Havana, is still South, and I have not seen him for a month.

"In connection with my real estate business I have had plans drawn which simply contemplate modernizing the interior of the hall and adding to the comfort and convenience of its patrons.

"I am not retained to handle any vaudeville enterprise, nor is that my line of work. Since the termination of my connection with the Castle Square Theatre I have had no intention of establishing a permanent opera company in Boston."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAR. 24, 1900.

H. W. Savage's Plans for the Use of Music Hall.

H. W. Savage says: As the agent for the present owners of the Music Hall property, I wish to correct the unauthorized and contradictory series of statements appearing in this morning's issue of the Boston Post.

This purchase of the old Music Hall was made Feb. 8. 1899, over a year ago, by a syndicate which I represent and of which Mr. R. H. Allen is simply one member, and was a real estate transaction pure and simple. The property is in the market and can be purchased today.

Mr. Allen has never had a plan of securing a license for himself or of running a vaudeville entertainment in conjunction with the sale of drinks. He has not been in New York consulting with me on this matter, but has been in Havana, is still south, and I have not seen him for a month.

In connection with my real estate business, I have had plans drawn which simply contemplate modernizing the interior of the hall and adding to the comfort and convenience of its patrons.

I am not retained to handle any vaudeville enterprise, nor is that my line of work. Since the termination of my connection with the Castle Sq. Theatre I have had no intention of establishing a permanent opera company in Boston.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII, NO. 77.
SUNDAY, MARCH 18, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mozart Symphony Is Given a Charming Interpretation.

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the Young Hungarian Pianist, Scores a Brilliant Success in His Playing of the Beethoven Concerto—He Is Given Four Recalls.

For the 19th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, the programme was:

Symphony No. 36, in C major..........Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major Beethoven
"Thus Spake Zarathustra"..........R. Strauss
Overture to "Oberon"..................Weber

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist, was the soloist.

The Mozart symphony, after the three great ones in E flat, G minor and the "Jupiter," is prominent among the master's best works of this description. Its lovely adagio and its solid, exquisitely melodious and beautifully worked-out finale, of themselves give it a special distinction. It was accorded a perfect reading by Mr. Gericke, the slow movement escaping the dragging pace at which it is usually taken, and the presto the over-rapid hurry-scurry. It was a charmingly colored and sensitively sympathetic interpretation, from beginning to end.

The Strauss Symphonic Poem as presented on this occasion was less noisy, less wild and whirring than it seemed to be at its earlier performances, and under the treatment it received generally, more clear, and perhaps on the whole more sane; but it still remains a severe tax on the understanding, and makes a cruel demand, on the patience of the listener. It is probable that if Zarathustra had not spoken so much, and had been a trifle more intelligible, he might have appealed more directly to the sympathies; but, as it is, he seems to have indulged in garrulity over nothing of vital moment, as far as music is competent to express his utterances. Nietzsche's book of itself is something of a subtle puzzle, and its solution is not simplified by translating it into tone color. Of splendid orchestration, ingenious and effective contrapuntal devices, massively rich effects, daring harmonies there is an abundance, in fact, a superabundance, but most of it is ugly, and consequently at variance with the well-founded principle that claims for high art a devotion to the beautiful.

It is hardly wise to pass an adverse judgment on the music of the end of the century extremists, for as time passes it may turn out that this work is devoted to the beautiful, after all, and is overflowing with a charm that the future will make clear. One becomes accustomed to everything through prolonged acquaintance with it—even misery. All that the opponent of this latter day music is safe in saying of it is that he does not like it. He may be pitied by those who do like it, or who pretend to, but he is standing on firm ground, for he cannot be contradicted. Moreover, he leaves himself an opportunity to make the amende honorable, if ever the time should come around when what now excites distaste will be as the honey of Hybla in his mouth. However, there is and can be nothing but admiration for the judgment shown by Mr. Gericke in reading the work, and for the magnificent virtuosity of the orchestra in the easy smoothness with which it mastered its tremendous difficulties in the performance.

Mr. Dohnanyi made a brilliant success in his playing of the Beethoven concerto. What was particularly delightful in his playing was its freedom from all empty display and its devotion to the music instead of exemplifying his skill in finger gymnastics. He has a beautiful touch, a solid and brilliant technique, the refined taste of an innate artist and an exceptional respect for the instrument to which he has devoted himself. There is no pounding of it, no attempt to force its tone, none of the thousand and one tricks to which of late we have been so accustomed.

So discreet is he in his treatment of it, so quietly and modestly does he acquit himself at it, that those who hear with their eyes are very liable to fall short in due appreciation of the exquisite musicianly qualities of his playing, for firstly and lastly the work of this young artist shows him to be a musician by instinct, to whom his fingers are merely a means to an end, instead of the end itself. There is not a trace of the sickly sentimentality, the posing and the bidding for applause by a sacrifice of his artistic conscience that have carried so many of our visiting pianists to the height of popularity.

His reading of the noble concerto was free from any seeking after new readings, was logical, sympathetic, refined in conception and charming in phrasing and tone color; and in its technical presentation was fairly fascinating. The performance, it is true, shared the artist's individuality, but this in no wise did injustice to the composer.

In brief, Mr. Dohnanyi made it evident that he is already among the foremost of living pianists, with a strong promise of still greater possibilities before him. By the time that the first movement of the concerto was over, his success was assured, and at its close there was a storm of applause and four recalls for him. A word of warm praise is due the two brilliant cadenzas composed by the artist for the concerto, and for the excellent judgment with which they were kept in harmony with the spirit of the work. Nor must Mr. Gericke's treatment of the orchestral score be passed by without an acknowledgment of its felicitous skill.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Alfonso and Estrella," Schubert; Aria, "La Fiancee du Timbalier," Saint-Saens; Suite No. 1, "Peer Gynt," Grieg; "Schmerzen" and "Traume," Wagner, and Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony. Mme. Marie Brema is to be the soloist.

Out of town patrons of the Symphony rehearsals, who were kept at home by the rain of the early morning, lost the sensation of the winter. There were many vacant seats at last Friday's concert, but the enthusiasm aroused by the young soloist was none the less warm for that. Indeed, it was at the boiling point, and this boy with the unpronounceable name was applauded without stint. Any hope of compelling an encore was squelched by Mr. Gericke, who shook his head at his young friend, who was quite willing to respond to the clamor. Though encores at these concerts are not countenanced, here was a case where the exception might have proved the rule. But we shall hope to hear Ernst von Dohnanyi again. And to think, this youthful artist wears his brown hair the regulation length and looks like any other nice boy without a particle of affectation. Oh, girls, you don't know what you missed Friday!

Mr. and Mrs. Gericke asked a few musical people to meet Herr von Dohnanyi at luncheon Thursday. The celebrated young pianist made a close calculation when he arrived on the Oceanic Wednesday, came over from New York on the 3 P. M. train that afternoon, and rehearsed and played at Sanders Theatre at the Thursday concert for his American debut. At the rehearsal and concert Friday, and last night Herr von Dohnanyi made a distinctly fine impression. For the 20th rehearsal and concert Mme. Marie Brema will be the soloist.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. MARCH 17, 1900.

Mr. Gericke included novelty in his nineteenth Symphony programme; however it was not new music, but a new musician, that he introduced—the pianist. Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, who repeated in Boston, Beethoven's fourth concerto, in G major, wherein he had already made an excellent impression at Sanders Theatre on the preceding Thursday evening. This young man of two or three and twenty had the advantage of presenting himself with far more commendation for serious merit and sober studies (as well in composition as in performance) than as a virtuoso.

There have been displayed of late, and by so many players, the superabundance of technique, amazing and really confounding velocity, tremendous tone volume, dazzling brilliancy or startling originality of phrase and interpretation, that it is a pleasure and a relief to receive some one whose first thought and intention apparently are to present his chosen music sensibly, clearly, and respectfully—to neglect nothing in art or mechanism which can contribute to such a result, but to hold all such elements in abeyance when they are not needed for this purpose.

The cadenzas composed by Mr. Dohnanyi were finely conceived, and beautifully executed; and were not, as sometimes happens, extraneous ornaments, foreign to the spirit of the work. His presentation of the concerto revealed a true artistic perception, and sympathetic feeling. He was most enthusiastically received and recalled many times.

The concert began as with an exhilarating fresh breeze by a delightfully airy and enlivening performance of Mozart's symphony in C major, which was an admirable choice for the first number, considering what serious matters were immediately to follow. The end of the evening came with Weber's "Oberon" overture, whose dreamy beauty, far-away fancies and lovely play of instrumentation came cool and soothing after the strange, yet impressive and exciting pages of Richard Strauss, which had immediately preceded. For the third number was a repetition of that weird, wild and almost inexplicable "Thus spake Zarathustra," whose intrinsic power proved no less dominant than at the first hearing, which won evidently even a greater appreciation and admiration, and yet remained mystical and perplexing to the end, and left a great proportion of the listeners in doubt as to how they might match the orphic utterances of the prophet to the grandiose and intensely colored music.

It was read by Mr. Gericke (who evidently has a keen grasp of its subtle meanings as well as liking for its original and complicated tone schemes) in a grand style, and from the deep organ chord of the beginning to the mysterious pizzicato of the basses at the close, it held the listener in an almost hypnotic state of interest. Yet, what did Zarathustra say and mean?

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Journal.
SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1900.

The peerless Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert in New York Thursday afternoon, and, according to the New York Sun, "the attendance was small enough to suggest that New York might not, after all, be a city that takes much pleasure in concerts." No; the New Yorkers prefer the opera, where they can compare jewels and converse without the slightest interruption from the music.

MR. SAVAGE DENIES IT.

Mr. Henry W. Savage, the agent for the present owners of the Boston Music Hall property, denies that it has been purchased by Mr. Rollin H. Allen for a vaudeville entertainment house.

Boston Transcript.
MONDAY, MARCH 19, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Mozart: Symphony No. 36, in C major (Koechel, No. 425).
Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58.
Richard Strauss: Symphonic Poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," opus 30.
Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi was the pianist.

The Mozart symphony has not been heard here for a good many years. One is somewhat surprised to find Otto Jahn saying of it that it "bears traces of Haydn's influence, direct and indirect." That anything in the symphonic form, written in Austria in 1783 by Mozart or anyone else, should "bear traces of Haydn's influence" might be taken for granted, for Haydn virtually dominated the whole style at that period. But this particular symphony seems the last one would have picked out to make the remark about, for what Haydn influence is to be described in it is enormously overshadowed by Mozart's own personality. The work is full of that peculiarly Mozartian idiom which we find in its most familiar type in "Don Giovanni;" almost throughout the symphony you can hear the Don, Zerlina and Masetto singing gleefully "Ed a ballar cogli altri andiamo tutti trè!" It is a delightful work, and was most admirably played.

And we have heard Richard Strauss's "Zarathustra" again! This stupendous composition becomes more and more interesting. To be sure, there is much in it which still repells, much that one cannot yet understand and like. But we should remember that, thirty years ago, Wagner's "Tristan" sounded much the same, and, fifty years ago, Schumann's B-flat variations for two pianofortes seemed no clearer. "Zarathustra" is still considerably "in the future." But even now it takes a certain wilful blindness not to see that Strauss has something to say here, and says it with enormous force. I have heard people say that they could recognize a good half of Wagner in this "Zarathustra;" but I cannot. Save for one motive that reminds one of something in the "Holländer," I can find nothing distinctively Wagnerian in the work; if it comes to picking out suggestive likenesses, I find more of Donizetti and Verdi (of all people in the world!) than of Wagner. It all seems very original to me, very Straussian and little else.

What tremendous power there is in that exordium! I can recall nothing else in all music so thoroughly enharmonic as that C minor chord, coming between the two chords of C major. In enharmonic harmony a chord is usually either one thing or another, the ear cannot tell which, until the resolution comes; but the ear immediately feels this C minor chord to be both things at once; the "questionable note" is heard as E-flat and D-sharp at the same time, and the ear grasps both significances. You cannot help recognizing it as essentially chromatic (with a D-sharp), and yet you get the whole minor effect of an E-flat!

Then that whole passage "Of the Dwellers in the Rear World;" what a transcendently powerful expression it is of what I will call popular religious feeling! It is the apotheosis of the sentimental psalm-tune. It has its vulgar side—approaching the vulgarity of the "Handel Largo" in the contrast between a portentous volume of tone and the sugared sentimentalism of the theme—and this is perhaps why it seems to me an expression of "popular" religiosity; so patent is this that one would like to know Strauss better, to be sure whether the whole passage is meant seriously or ironically. But there is an enormous amount of beauty in it, notwithstanding. The fugato "Of Science" grows upon one; a most curious piece of writing, a square slap in the face of all one's notions of counterpoint. Here is something new in music—a fugued passage that is to a great extent intrinsically unpolyphonic! Strauss seems to have thought out a series of dissonant harmonies in an entirely homophonic way; and then let his fugal parts climb round from chord to chord, generally picking out the dissonant notes, without regard for the contrapuntal relations of one part to another. It is applying en gros the system applied by Wagner, in a smaller way, in his terrific "Ew'ge Nacht, süsse Nacht!" in the second act of "Tristan und Isolde"—where the harmony is perfectly logical homophonically, but the voice-parts go skipping from 7th to 7th. After all, it is only the ruthlessness with which this idea is carried out that is really new; you can find in some of Schumann's fugal writing (and for chorus, too—see passages in the closing chorus of the first part of "Paradise and the Peri") where what the lowest voice sings is not a real bass, harmonically speaking, but only a phrase transposed from the top to the bottom of the harmony, in defiance of every principle of double counterpoint. And, with Strauss, the general cacophonous effect comes more from his recklessly illogical use of passing-notes than from the peculiar system I have mentioned. I am not at all sure, by the way, that his daringly illogical passing-notes are harsher to the ear than some of Sebastian Bach's perfectly logical ones; I know of an orchestral Adagio of Bach's where (counting from the bass upward) the notes A-flat, C, F-sharp, A-natural, B, D, G come together; Strauss cannot do worse than that, as my own ears can testify!

I have got over my distaste for the ending in two keys; musically it is nonsense, if you will, but the mystical poetic suggestion can pardon it; only the scoring of the high B major chords sounds to me terribly cold and thin. Strauss, by the way, once made a joke about this passage himself; when rehearsing the work in Cologne, he said to the orchestra: "Gentlemen, I have had to write these C's for the 'celli and basses, because the 'cello does not go down to B."

The performance was wonderfully fine and euphonious, full of delicacy, vigor and power. Perhaps it may be even improved upon in years to come; it is hard to tell now whether the composer really loses his way at moments, or whether the fault lies in the playing. But in a work so problematical to everyone—possibly to Richard Strauss himself—one cannot expect to have everything revealed at once. Such a performance as Mr. Gericke and the orchestra gave last Saturday can only be called a triumph.

Of all orchestral compositions in the world, probably the fittest to follow immediately after Strauss's "Zaranthustra" is Weber's overture to "Oberon." No more refreshing contrast could be imagined. The overture was played to perfection, wonderfully!

Mr. von Dohnanyi made an exceedingly deep, fine and dignified impression with his playing of Beethoven's G major concerto. Only in the first movement did I find some things not to like. It seems to me that the profound soulfulness of this movement strikes deeper into the heart when not quite so heavily underscored; the pianist's very slow tempo was already a little over-sentimental, and every now and then he evinced a tendency rather to "rub it in." His playing of the second movement, however, was so essentially poetic that one could forgive his disregard for Beethoven's directions and expression-marks; he made a beautiful poem out of it in his own way. In the final rondo he was admirable at every point. Upon the whole one seldom hears so fine a performance of this concerto. Mr. von Dohnanyi played his own cadenzas, admirably written, with all due "piety," and sufficiently brilliant. He was loudly applauded and recalled. Here is a pianist from whom one would fain hear more; one who seems to have had a hand in building up his own reputation, and not left it wholly to the passionate press-agent.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 30, and Saturday evening, March 31 (there will be no rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Schubert, overture to "Alfonso und Estrella;" Saint-Saëns, aria, "La fiancée du timbalieu;" Grieg, suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt," opus 48; Wagner, songs with pianoforte, "Schmerzen" and "Träume;" Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56. Mme. Marie Brema will be the singer.

W. F. A.

Boston Transcript
FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1900

NO THEATRE IN MUSIC HALL

Henry W. Savage Contradicts the Report That It Is to Be Turned into a Vaudeville House—No Intention of Establishing Permanent Opera in Boston

Henry W. Savage has requested the Transcript to correct the unauthorized and contradictory series of statements that appeared in a Boston marning paper today, respecting the Music Hall property, of which he is the official agent. He says:

"The purchase of the old Music Hall was made on Feb. 8, 1899, more than a year ago, by a syndicate, which I represent, and of which Rollin H. Allen is simply one member. It was a real estate transaction pure and simple, as the property is in the market and can be purchased today.

Mr. Allen has never had a plan of securing a license for himself, or of running a vaudeville entertainment in conjunction with the sale of drinks. He has not been in New York consulting with me on this matter, but has been in Havana, is still South, and I have not seen him for a month.

"In connection with my real estate business I have had plans drawn which simply contemplate modernizing the interior of the hall and adding to the comfort and convenience of its patrons.

"I am not retained to handle any vaudeville enterprise, nor is that my line of work. Since the termination of my connection with the Castle Square Theatre I have had no intention of establishing a permanent opera company in Boston."

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
SATURDAY MORNING, MAR. 24, 1900.

H. W. Savage's Plans for the Use of Music Hall.

H. W. Savage says: As the agent for the present owners of the Music Hall property, I wish to correct the unauthorized and contradictory series of statements appearing in this morning's issue of the Boston Post.

This purchase of the old Music Hall was made Feb. 8. 1899, over a year ago, by a syndicate which I represent and of which Mr. R. H. Allen is simply one member, and was a real estate transaction pure and simple. The property is in the market and can be purchased today.

Mr. Allen has never had a plan of securing a license for himself or of running a vaudeville entertainment in conjunction with the sale of drinks. He has not been in New York consulting with me on this matter, but has been in Havana, is still south, and I have not seen him for a month.

In connection with my real estate business, I have had plans drawn which simply contemplate modernizing the interior of the hall and adding to the comfort and convenience of its patrons.

I am not retained to handle any vaudeville enterprise, nor is that my line of work. Since the termination of my connection with the Castle Sq. Theatre I have had no intention of establishing a permanent opera company in Boston.

TON POST FRIDAY MARCH 23.

VAUDEVILLE IN OLD MUSIC HALL

HENRY W. SAVAGE,
The well-known Boston theatrical manager, who is to manage the new theatrical enterprise in old Music Hall.

Close to $1,000,000 Paid by R. H. Allen for the Property.

Rollin H. Allen of the Castle Square Theatre has purchased the old Boston Music Hall. It is understood that when the transaction was made and the papers passed that Mr. Allen wrote out his personal check for the full amount in payment, and that the amount was very close to one million dollars.

Beside owning the Castle Square Theatre and Castle Square Hotel Mr. Allen has other very large real estate interests in Boston, and is rated as a very wealthy man, as well as a shrewd manipulator of important real estate deals.

The Music Hall property has been much in the eye of the public the past year. At one time it was talked of as intended for an immense dry goods emporium, and firms mentioned as desiring it for such a purpose were Siegel & Cooper of New York and Chicago and John Wanamaker of New York and Philadelphia.

Future of the Pop Concerts.

The present lease of Music Hall is understood to run up to May 1 of this year. When Mr. Allen acquired the property it looked first as though the regular "Pop" concerts, if there were to be any this year, would have to be given somewhere outside of this famous old temple of music.

Mr. Allen had a plan for securing a license for himself starting May 1, and he proposed to run a vaudeville entertainment in conjunction with the sale of drinks, instead of having the Symphony Orchestra, as has been the custom.

The present plan, however, it is understood, is to allow the present occupants of Music Hall to go on with their "Pop" concerts as usual this season. These customarily stop about the first week in July. Extensive alterations will then be begun by Mr. Allen. In fact the changes will almost amount to rebuilding, for Mr. Allen has said to friends that he proposed to have the most magnificent theatre in this city. Under this new plan the style of entertainment proposed is continuous vaudeville.

As Mr. Allen considers himself a real estate man rather than a showman he has arranged to let Henry W. Savage, who is recognized as a very shrewd and successful showman, run the new theatre for him, it being understood that the performance would be continuous vaudeville.

May Be Home for Opera.

Recent developments indicate a possible change of plan, however. Mr. Allen is in New York now consulting with Mr. Savage on this matter, and word was telegraphed over from there to the Post yesterday that Maurice Grau and Henry W. Savage had made arrangements to give grand opera in English at the Metropolitan Opera House in New York.

It seems more than probable from this that Mr. Allen's new theatre might become the long-hoped-for Boston home of opera. This new English grand opera company might be seen here for a season of six or eight weeks, and the remaining time of the regular season would naturally be occupied by one or more of Mr. Savage's several large companies presenting grand and light opera in English.

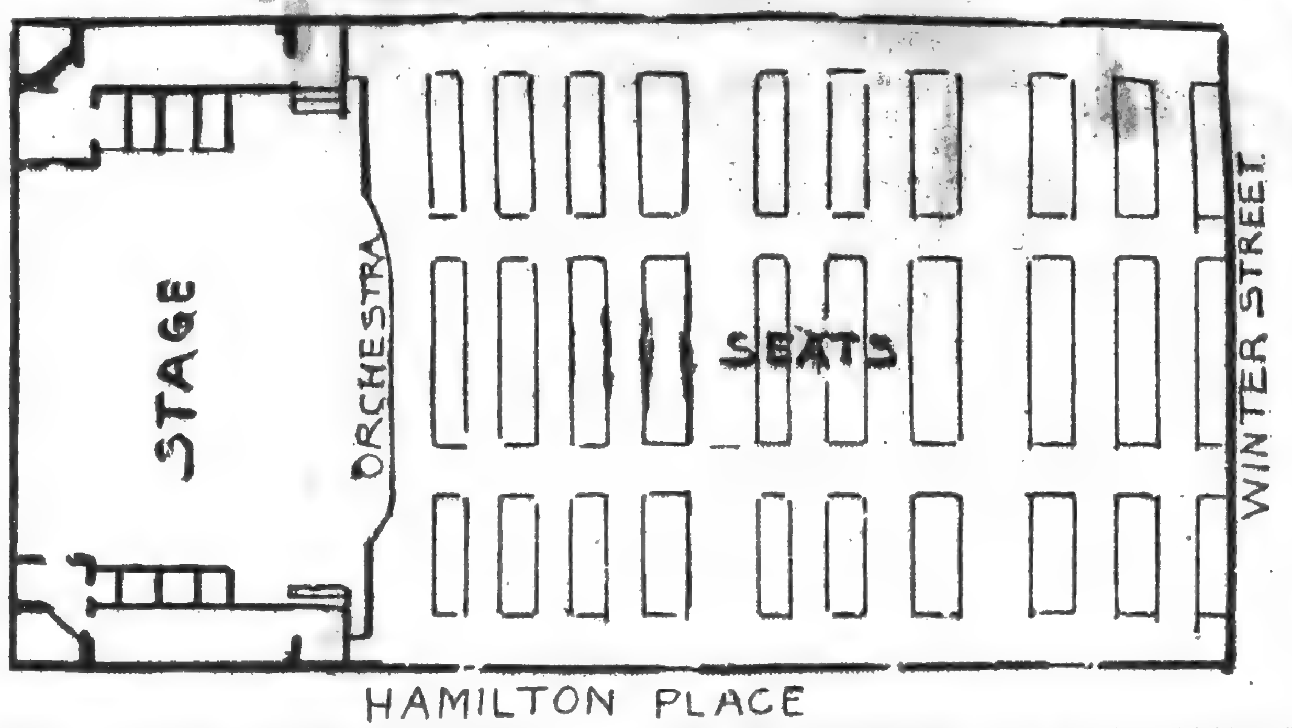
It is known that Mr. Savage has long been anxious to establish a permanent opera company in Boston on the same plan that he pursues at the American Theatre in New York city, at his theatre in Chicago and elsewhere.

Eventually it is planned to have an entrance to the new theatre from Washington street as well as from Hamilton place and Winter street, as at present.

BOSTON POST, SATURDAY, MA[illegible] 24

OLD MUSIC HALL CHANGES.

Mr. Savage to Refurnish and Thoroughly Modernize the Structure.



FLOOR PLAN OF OLD MUSIC HALL, SHOWING THE STAGE AS IT WILL BE PLACED WHEN THE CONTEMPLATED CHANGES ARE MADE.

The sale of the old Music Hall property, which has been kept quiet for over a year and which the Post announced exclusively yesterday morning, is to develop one of the biggest entertainment enterprises which Boston has ever known. The property changed hands on Feb. 8, 1899, being sold to Mr. Rollin Allen and his associates, who were represented by Henry W. Savage, the big real estate man of Boston, who is to manage the property from the business end. Mr. Savage, acting for the syndicate, is in a few months to begin the entire remodelling and refurnishing of the old hall, making such changes as will make it as convenient and modern as any amusement building in the country. The floor plan is to be completely changed so as to bring the stage at the opposite end of the building from its present location. New and commodious dressing rooms are to be built and the galleries are to be extended and modernized and boxes of the latest pattern will be built on either side of the stage.

The space now taken up by the present stage is to be converted into seating room and a commodious foyer, the entrances being so arranged as to bring them in the rear of the hall.

Mr. Savage said that as soon as the contemplated changes are made the syndicate will be ready to let the hall for big entertainment projects.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1900.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last of Its Matinee Concerts for the Present Season—Mr. Adamowski the Soloist.

The fifth and last of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinée concerts took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin and orchestra, Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" fantasie-overture, and the seventh symphony of Beethoven. This made a pleasing programme of music well suited to the average matinée audience, which is not supposed to have an appetite for such solid food as an evening assembly. Yet it cannot be said that there was nothing solid on the list, for the Beethoven work is of the highest type and demands of the listener an appreciation of all that is noblest in symphonic art. The Tschaikowsky overturē has not been heard recently. It does not improve upon long acquaintance. The "Romeo and Juliet" overture is much superior to it in thematic ideas and in working out. Yet it is not a work to be passed lightly by, for it is characteristic of a great master, and in passages it rises to a considerable height. It was played yesterday in that precise, finished, and decorous manner which has become familiar to us since Mr. Gericke returned to the conductorship of the Boston orchestra. The smoothness was no doubt more than usually polished yesterday by reason of the indisposition of the conductor, who is suffering from a cold

The solo performer of the afternoon was Mr. Timothée Adamowski, one of the well-known violinists of the orchestra. He has been heard here several times, but never to such great advantage as yesterday. He played the Lalo composition with brilliant technic, with a beautiful, if not large, tone, with splendid mastery of its contents, with dash and elegance of style, and with an authority which has not hitherto been a conspicuous feature of his performances. Mr. Adamowski has grown as an artist. His style has gained much in breadth and finish, and his phrasing is more finished. Such a performance as he gave us yesterday was an exhibition of the best sort of virtuosity. He was recalled several times, and he thoroughly deserved all the applause he received.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the seventh symphony was not altogether in accordance with the traditions (as they are known here) in respect of tempi. In the first movement there was nothing to find fault with in this particular, but he seemed to us to play the second movement a trifle too fast and the third just a shade too slow. It is not unlikely that the tempi would have escaped notice if the accentuation had been more incisive. But it is not in the temperament of Mr. Gericke to make things bite very hard, and we must content ourselves with the exquisite beauty of the quality and the balance of tone, the solidity of it, and the perfect smoothness with the stream of music which flows from the instrumental body under his baton. Perhaps it is not unhealthful for us to hear the classics played in such a manner that they speak for themselves rather than become the media for striking readings. At any rate, it is good to hear them thus occasionally, and it can never be other than an enjoyment to hear them played with so much finish.

It was announced yesterday that, owing to Mr. Gericke's cold, Schumann's D minor symphony would be played to-night, instead of Mozart's in C; but no explanation was offered as to why Mr. Gericke, when troubled with a cold, found it easier to conduct Schumann than Mozart.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.

THE EVENING SUN, per month.................. .20
THE EVENING SUN, per year.....................$2.00

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's last concert but one, at Carnegie Hall yesterday, and its final hearing to-night, are the first real warning to the public that the present musical season is near its close. That music here must have a "season" is matter for regret; only the quality of the season while it lasts can make up for its limitation in time. The matinée yesterday was of familiar music played as none but the Boston orchestra in this entire western hemisphere can play. The soloist, moreover, Mr. Adamowski, was taken from the organization itself, and this fact was the sign and symbol of the virtuosity of the visiting orchestra. The soloist's number was Lalo's so-called Spanish symphony, for violin and orchestra, op. 21. The orchestra was itself displayed in the romantic "Hamlet" fantasy-overture of Tsckaikowsky, op. 67, which may, indeed, be a tragedy with Hamlet quite left out, but which has a melancholy beauty of its own that does not fail to appeal to music-lovers. Most popular with yesterday's audience, however, were the first and last numbers on the programme. One was Smetana's overture to "The Bartered Bride" and the other was the seventh symphony of Beethoven. Both were played in a manner that remains the standard of orchestral achievement in this city. It may not be amiss to say, on this occasion, that ten concerts a year is not enough of music of this class in the second city of the world. Yet so long as the audiences are of no more than comfortable proportions, which was the case yesterday, it is doubtful if the frequency of these visits could be increased. And more's the pity.

Mme. Sembrich repeated at the Metropolitan last night her performance of "Lucia di Lammermoor," and Mme. Calvé was heard for the fifth time in "Cavalleria Rusticana." In the latter opera, the Alfio of Sig. Scotti was a new personation. The Italian baritone added materially to the interest of the occasion, although the two soprano singers monopolized popular attention. The audience was a large one.

Rarely has better news been heard than is afforded by the announcement to-day of plans for grand opera in English at the Metropolitan. Maurice Grau and Henry W. Savage are united in this enterprise and their agreement, which is for a term of years, contemplates a season from Oct. 1 to Dec. 15, and, after an extended tour, a return to the Metropolitan for April and May. It is intended to give eight performances weekly, divided between two operas, and this at prices from 25 cents to $2. It is further announced that negotiations are in progress with those singers identified with the American and European operatic stage who are best equipped to give opera in English in an artistic manner. The chorus will number seventy youthful, well-schooled voices, largely drawn from the Castle Square choruses and the American chorus of the Metropolitan. The orchestra will comprise forty of the best musicians in New York, under competent direction.

THE [illegible]
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Ends Its New York Series To-night—Yesterday's Concert—Double Bill at the Opera.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will end to-night at Carnegie Hall its fourteenth annual series of concerts in New York. Yesterday the fifth and last matinee took place there, under Mr. Gericke's direction, before an audience scarcely complimentary, as to its members, to the Boston organization. It is an instance of the inertia of concert-goers in this city that these afternoon entertainments of the Boston Orchestra have been attended, during the two seasons of their existence, by only a moderate proportion of those who go to the afternoon public rehearsals of the Philharmonic Society. The Boston band deserves a larger share of the attention of afternoon music-seekers. At the evening concerts, on the other hand, the visiting orchestra has had for several years a splendid clientele. The five matinees and five evening concerts will be continued as usual next season.

To-night's programme includes Schumann's fourth symphony, the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The soloist will be Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist, who will then make his New York debut.

This programme is a fair sample of the lists offered here this season by the Boston Orchestra. The music played at these concerts for the first time in this city has included the Cesar Franck symphony in D minor, Glazounoff's sixth symphony, Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," Loeffler's "Nights in the Ukrain," for violin and orchestra, with Mr. Kneisel, and Siegfried Wagner's "Der Barenhauter" overture. Other music played here this season has included the second, seventh and eighth symphonies of Beethoven. These overtures were performed: "Berlioz's "King Lear," Brahm's "Tragic" and Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina." For soloist and orchestra have been presented the Dvorak 'cello concerto, with Mr. Schroeder; the Mendelssohn violin concerto, with Miss Leonora Jackson; the fourth Rubinstein piano concerto, with Mr. Hambourg; arias by Mozart and Bellini, sung by Mme. Sembrich, and arias by Saint-Saens and Mozart, sung by Miss Olitzka.

Besides these, there have been performed by the Boston Orchestra Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," two movements from a Moszkowski suite; Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Yesterday's concert had as its final number Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Not often is it played here with such clear proclamation of its form and substance as was vouchsafed to the Carnegie Hall audience. Mr. Gericke read it with something like enthusiasm and the orchestra shared his mood. The performance was brimming with energy and the orchestral tone was of as admirable a quality as ever. Brilliancy and solidity were in evidence throughout.

The other numbers for orchestra alone were the overture to Smetana's "Bartered Bride" and Tschaikowsky's fantasy-overture "Hamlet." The Smetana music, not often heard here, was played with virtuosity. The rush and whirl and bustle of it all counted in the right direction. Tschaikowsky's grim, yet bautiful, "Hamlet" music was well worth bringing forward again. It is programme music, of course, but it could stand alone without the need of a literary framework. The treatment of the twelve notes of the muted horn, for example, is interesting, and one need not know that they are supposed to mark the midnight hour, or the crash of the cymbals the sight of the murdered King of Denmark's ghost. The Boston men played this overture with their accustomed skill. Incidentally, the audience heard some muted-horn tones that were not the blood-curdling sounds usually evoked by such treatment.

The soloist at yesterday's concert was Mr. Timothee Adamowski, one of the first violins of the Boston Orchestra. He was heard in Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," which is practically a violin concerto. Mr. Adamowski has played better here than he did yesterday, for although he never lacked vivacity and spirit, and brought out the whimsical beauty and charm of Lalo's music, his tone was less pure and his execution less smooth and even than it has been on other occasions. The orchestral background to this seemed, occasionally confused and uncertain. The music itself has more melodic and rhythmic interest than many a more recent work for violin and orchestra. At yesterday's concert four movements were played, the third being omitted.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1900.

PIANIST'S SUCCESSFUL DEBUT.

Ernst von Dohnyányi, the Hungarian pianist, made his début here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night.

It is not often nowadays that a Beethoven concerto arouses great enthusiasm. But this pianist's playing of that composer's Opus 58 (G major) was technically so flawless, his tone was so clear and sympathetic, and his interpretation so poetic that the audience recalled him no less than six times. Few young pianists have been so warmly welcomed here.

The orchestra, under Mr. Gericke, played admirably Schumann's D minor symphony, Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Weber's "Oberon" overture.

New-York Daily Tribune.
FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1900.

A NEW PIANO PLAYER.

Distrustful of the effect of an old fashioned Mozart symphony in a room with the acoustic conditions of Carnegie Hall, Mr. Gericke changed the programme of the last of this season's concerts in the Borough of Manhattan by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and produced Schumann's symphony in D minor instead of the promised symphony by Mozart in C. The change was disappointing to local amateurs, who, while fully cognizant of the shortcomings of Carnegie Hall, were not as apprehensive as Mr. Gericke as to the effect in it which a Mozart symphony would have made played with the purity of tone and beautiful balance characteristic of the Boston Orchestra's work in this field of music. Under the circumstances it was but natural if they deplored having been deprived of the pleasure of listening to a classic which is as good as a sealed book to the present generation of concert goers, for the promised symphony in C was not the familiar one which has been dubbed "Jupiter," but an earlier one which, as explained in this journal last summer, was probably composed before 1784. Mr. Gericke might, moreover, have trusted in Richard Strauss's what is it, entitled "Also sprach Zarathrustra," to have convinced his hearers of the tonal puissance of his band, but since he made the change out of consideration for the public, it would be ungracious either to repine or complain. There was enough to rejoice over in the entertainment which he provided.

The most interesting of his offerings was Beethoven's G major pianoforte concerto, with the solo part played by Ernst von Dohnányi, in whom, since he sprang into public notice two years ago or thereabouts, the musical public have felt a very proper interest—very proper because the incidents which created it were not of the ordinary sensational or meretricious kind. Mr., or Herr, or Monsier, or Pan, Dohnánpi won a prize in composition which had drawn the eyes of the musicians and had astonished and delighted London, but he did not, because of that circumstance, immediately start out with a flourish of trumpets upon a conquest of the world. Had Mr. Gericke, who was one of the adjudicators in the Bösendörfer composition, in which he was victorious, not been so anxious for his co-operation in a series of the Boston Orchestra concerts as to prevail upon him to come to America for that series alone, we should not have heard him. He came, therefore, under unusual conditions, and he has fulfilled a lovely mission. His achievement last night was brightly illuminative not of pianoforte virtuosoship, as that term is popularly understood, but of sweet, healthy musicianship. He played the concerto from beginning like a musician who knew it because he loved and loved it, because he knew it down to its inmost heart beats. He made no display of pianistic feats, and since he did not try to do anything in that direction it is not to be said what his capacity as a specialist may be. It is doubtful if he could bewilder were he to try, for there are elements in pianoforte playing which have been exploited here over and over again this season which are not at his command, if we are to judge by the evidence afforded last night. So much of charm as lies in pure sensuousness of tone is only moderately represented in his playing. There were times when a more fluent legato would have been agreeable, and the instrument which he plays has a lovelier tone than that which he produced, but his reading was permeated by a spirit of poetry which was all the more heart warming because it was so utterly free from the slack of sentimentality or weakness of any kind. All was sane and sound, the utterance of a man who felt, as Beethoven said, that it was the purpose of music to strike fire from the soul of man, not to put it in the melting mood. Not the least interesting of his demonstrations of a noble birth in music was made in the two cadenzas of his own composition, which he introduced in the concerto. In the first, especially, there was a capital illustration of the correct appreciation of the duty of a virtuoso in writing a cadenza—the duty to stick in letter and spirit to the text set by the composer. The success of the young artist with the public was complete and emphatic. He was recalled over and over again to acknowledge the grateful tributes of the audience.

The work of the orchestra was brilliant all evening, though greater elasticity and freedom of movement would have benefited the symphony. Gorgeous beyond description was the Strauss phantasmagoria in tones.

The New York Press
DAILY EDITION.
New York, Friday, March 23, 1900.

NEW PIANIST PLAYS FOR US.

Ernst Von Dohnanyi Heard at Last Symphony Concert.

Fitting was the close last night to the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The concert served to introduce a new pianist of European reputation, Ernst Von Dohnanyi. He proved himself an artist of exceptional merit. His playing of Beethoven's great concerto in G major was characterized by suavity and delicacy rather than strength. The audience grew unusually demonstrative over him, and called him out many times after his number. Undoubtedly he is an artist of much promise.

The orchestral numbers were Schumann's Symphony in D minor, Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and the overture to Weber's "Oberon," which brought the concert to a brilliant close. The splendid band, under Mr. Gericke, played with its customary finish. Strauss's extraordinary and mystical work apparently astonished more than it pleased the audience, yet the applause was hearty.

At the concert on last Wednesday afternoon the soloist was T. Adamowski. He played Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra—it really is a concerto—and gave a carefully finished reading to the work. The other numbers were the overture to Smetana's opera, "The Bartered Bride," Tchaikowsky's "Hamlet" Fantasy-Overture, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. The playing of the orchestra was of its usual excellence. The audience was small.

The New York Times.
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1900.

MUSIC HEARD YESTERDAY.

Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—A New Pianist Heard.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its series at Carnegie Hall last night in the presence of an audience large in numbers and generous in applause. The programme consisted of Schumann's D minor symphony, Beethoven's G major concerto for piano and orchestra, Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Thus spake Zarathustra," and Weber's overture to "Oberon." The last was the number with which this orchestra under its present conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, introduced itself to the New York public thirteen years ago. Perhaps Mr. Gericke may not have had this fact in mind when he elected to close the current season with this overture, but its presence at the end of the programme awoke many happy memories, memories which grow sweeter as they grow more numerous with the fleeting years.

The solo performer in the Beethoven concerto last night was Ernest Donhanyi, a young pianist who has already made a name for himself on the other side of the Atlantic, and who was acclaimed with delight at his recent American début in Boston. To please both Boston and New York falls to the lot of few pianists, and Mr. Donhanyi may account himself fortunate, or exceptionally gifted, for he achieved an immediate and well-earned success here. It was evidence of his respect for his art as well as of his readiness to subject himself to the most critical examination that he elected to make himself known through the medium of a work which calls for the purest and loftiest style of piano playing and offers no possibility of concealing musical shallowness behind a blinding display of virtuosity.

Mr. Donhanyi played the concerto beautifully. His reading of it was distinguished by a dignified continence of color, a broad and reposeful clarity, a surety of purpose, and an exquisite adaptation of all the details to the general exposition. His enunciation of the themes was manly, straightforward, and musically balanced. His building up of the climaxes of the development was full of power and brilliant in lucidity. His technic was ample, and manifestly there was an abundance of reserve force. His finger work was particularly vigorous, strong, and elastic. Indeed, throughout the first movement the crisp clearness of his musical diction evoked constant admiration. In the second he showed a fine command of tone color and the art of singing upon the piano. The last movement was filled with variety and contrast. But what was most important was the true appreciation of the Beethoven spirit. As an exposition of form and an analysis of content the interpretation recalled the performances of Dr. von Bülow at his best. It was a chaste, elevated, and refreshingly sane interpretation, yet high in conception, and both sincere and direct in presentation. Mr. Donhanyi is a young man, but he is already an artist of high rank.

The orchestra covered itself with glory. The accompaniment of the concerto was most admirable, and the Schumann symphony was played with a splendid elan, a solid and opulent tone, a military precision, and a firmly knit unanimity. The performance of the Strauss composition was a veritably amazing display of orchestral virtuosity. The players handled the formidable task with evident joy in their own powers and performed the most prodigious technical feats with consummate ease and inspiring dash. It was a magnificant performance, but was it worth while? Surely the audience did not think so, for it followed the work with a most gentle pattering of polite condemnation. This work is even less interesting than it was at a first hearing. The impression deepens that the piling of Tonal Pelion upon Ossa, the wresting of instruments from their natures, the struggle to make music tell a detailed story, to dissect self and epitomize philosophy, to ratiocinate, and to preach must ever be vain. The stupendous orchestral technic may astound, but there is no message for the hearer, only a vast tonal riddle for which there is no solution and which the strange cadence at the end leaves suspended, like the coffin of Mohammed, forever in midair.

The Sun.
FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the Pianist, Makes His Debut in New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its New York season last night at Carnegie Hall and introduced a new pianist, Ernst von Dohnanyi, to local audiences. Wilhelm Gericke's attack of influenza led him to substitute Schumann's Fourth symphony in place of the Mozart symphony announced. Von Weber's "Oberon" overture, Richard Strauss's symphonic poem, "Thus Spoke Zarathustra," and Beethoven's fourth piano concerto in E major made up the programme. The chief interest of the audience centred naturally in M. Dohnanyi, who has already gained some repute abroad, although he is only 22 years old. He was heard in Beethoven's fourth concerto, a number which gives little opportunity for display of his technical powers. He played it with judgment and revealed the possession of a truly classical style. His tone is not large, but equal and discreet. It has the ringing quality in an unusual degree. M. Dohnanyi is not sensational in any phase of his art. He made no attempt at brilliant or dazzling playing, which the concerto did not fallow. While lacking the tremendous power of Eugene d'Albert, he is plainly to be recognized as one of his pupils. A cadenza made of the themes of the concerto, evidently of the pianist's own composition, showed that he possessed excellent technical equipment.

Schumann's Fourth symphony with its idyllic second movement played much more rapidly than usual was scarcely up to the orchestra's average. The Strauss number was wonderfully played. A more brilliant orchestral performance could scarcely be imagined.

The Evening Post.
New York, Thursday, March 22, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Gericke undoubtedly bears a grudge against the New York patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Whenever he has anything particularly interesting he plays it in Boston, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and elsewhere, but Manhattan Borough is left out in the cold. A case in point is the selections from his new opera which Prof. Paine of Harvard, following the example of Wagner, has allowed to be heard previous to the performance of the opera itself. Prof. Paine was the first American who attained a high rank in music, and he has been at work many years on his opera. Why should New Yorkers alone be denied the privilege of hearing these samples of his work? It is unjust both to him and to us.

In place of Paine's music Mr. Gericke produced yesterday afternoon that haut nouveauté, Beethoven's seventh symphony, and Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" fantasia. Both are good music, and both were well played. But there was little occasion for repeating Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, a trivial composition which is played much too often. As for the solo piece on the programme, Lalo's "Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra," its infliction on a well-behaved audience is an offence that almost calls for the intervention of the grand jury. The composition is neither Spanish nor a symphony, but an unspeakably stupid concerto in five movements, one of which, luckily, was omitted. For the selection of this piece, no doubt, the soloist, Mr. T. Adamowski, must be held responsible, rather than the conductor. He played it remarkably well, but why did he not choose something worth playing? The Lalo concerto is little more than a string of technicalities, wofully common-place and deadly dull. Professional critics are constantly sneering at Liszt because there is so much display of technique in his compositions. But Liszt's technique is always interesting—think of the harmonic beauty and novelty of his arpeggios and broken chords, for instance!—whereas works like Lalo's, which escape censure, are nothing but cheap fireworks, without any harmonic or melodic beauty, or thought of any kind, behind them. Such pieces are quite as vulgar as the cheapest displays of vocal technique in the operas of Rossini or Bellini, and have no legitimate place in a serious concert programme.

At the last concert, this evening, of the Boston players, Mr. Dohnanyi will make his New York début. The programme has been improved by substituting a Schumann for a Mozart symphony.

The World.
ed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.
FRIDAY, MARCH 23, 1900.

DOHNANYI'S GREAT SUCCESS.

The Classic Young Pianist Carries Audience by Storm.

Ernst von Dohnányi, the young Hungarian pianist, made his debut in New York at Carnegie Hall last evening and achieved a great success. He justified all the extravagant praise that London and recently Boston has lavished upon him.

In these days of personal assertiveness in art, such a pianist is a surprise. He is an interpreter of the classic type. Everything he does is primarily musicianly. He does reverence to the composer, subordinating himself entirely. There is no display of his skill, no perversions for the sake of exhibiting special facilities of execution. He is refined, dignified, modest. His playing is of the purest type, honest, unaffected, sane.

What he may do with the romantic composers is something which can only be ascertained when he gives a recital, as he probably will soon. But as an exponent of Beethoven's music he may be set down as one of the first among contemporary pianists. Last night he played the noble concerto in G major. He read the work with intelligence, sympathy and feeling. He did not attempt to poetize it, nor did he go to the other extreme of prosaic inflexibility. He was eloquent within purely artistic forms. It seemed as if years had elapsed since Beethoven had had such an interpreter.

His equipment is perfect—an exquisite touch, a rare command of tone color, a discreet control of force, a subtle skill in his emphases. In the two cadenzas of his own, which he introduced in the concerto, he displays brilliant imagination.

The occasion was otherwise felicitous. It was the farewell concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and never have these musicians—over which Mr. Gericke should be proud to preside—established so emphatically their preeminence in orchestral work. Schumann's Fourth Symphony was played with splendid spirit; Richard Strauss's extraordinary "Thus Spoke Zarathustra" was executed with incredible virtuosity, and Weber's "Oberon" overture was made to sound like a new composition.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The
Commercial Advertiser Association.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 22, 1900.

The last matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given in the Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable of the season. No novelties were played, but the programme was happily selected, and the soloist, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who is a member of the orchestra, was more than satisfactory; in fact, it may be said with all due deference to the many violinists of greater pretensions that have played here this winter, that he equalled the best of them, and was better than many. It is only after listening to the playing of such men as Adamowski, Loeffler, Kneisel and Schroeder that one begins to understand why the Boston Symphony Orchestra so excels in all that it undertakes. A well disciplined band composed of such fine musicians must succeed.

The programme comprised Smetana's Bartered Bride overture, Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole," for violin and orchestra; Tschaikowsky's Hamlet overture-fantasia and Beethoven's symphony in A, No. 7. The Smetana overture is a most attractive work, bright and melodious, and affords abundant opportunity for an orchestra to exhibit its virtuosity. If for no other reason it is always a welcome number on a Boston programme, for that orchestra plays it superbly. Yesterday the men seemed to be in particularly good form. The tone-body seemed to be even richer and more resplendently brilliant than usual, and Mr. Gericke in this let himself go more than he is wont to do. It was good also to hear again Tschaikowsky's overture. Gloomy, fantastic, filled with grayness, reflecting the sombreness of the tragedy, it stood in bold relief to the other numbers. For most persons it is not so effective as his Romeo and Juliet, which was played by the band a year ago, owing chiefly to the sameness of the mood that permeates it, yet it shows one of the most characteristic phases of the Russian's genius. It is needless to say, almost, that Beethoven's beautiful symphony received adequate treatment in the hands of Mr. Gericke and his men.

Mr. Adamowski is rarely heard at such advantage as he was in Lalo's attractive work. His performance was most brilliant; he played with fine spirit and fire; his tone was round and sonorous; he displayed a fine grasp of the content of the work; his technique was almost flawless; in fact, his whole performance was one which attained to a very high degree of merit.

The Press

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1900.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Last Concert of the First Series Is Given and von Dohnanyi Meets a Cordial Reception.

Ernst von Donanyi, the young Hungarian pianist, made his first appearance in this city with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night and scored an undoubted success. The man who, with no previous heralding, with no preliminary booming, patiently played to a few empty houses in London about a year ago, and before the season was over packed St. James' Hall to the doors at an afternoon recital, has won his way by earnest effort and by dogged perseverance, and, to judge from his work of last night, should make a host of friends in this city. He has, perhaps, the least eccentric stage presence of any of the great pianists. There is no oddity of personal appearance, there are no mannerisms that distract the attention, only now and then when he becomes more than usually earnest in his playing, he bows his head far down over the keyboard and seems to lose himself in his music.

His rendition of the Beethoven concerto (No. 4 in G major) was technically excellent. The main impression left by it was one of absolute earnestness. His hand is firm and strong, yet his touch, at times, can be that of a feather. In the first moment of the concerto (allegro moderato, G major) he appeared perfectly at ease in the brilliant and difficult cadenzas, developing the different themes in a way that gave an idea of thorough mastership and at the same time imbuing every note with that earnest sympathy that went so far in winning him success. The second and third movements, too, were both well played, the second, the better of the two, perhaps, because in that the solo instrument is given a stronger and more convincing role to play. There is little doubt that only a better acquaintance is needed to give von Dolinanzi a high place among pianists in the estimation of Philadelphians.

Mr. Gericke chose an excellent program for this, the last concert of the series. The Schumann Symphony (No. 4, D minor, op. 120), though hurried through at a rather uncomfortable gait, was, barring a little raggedness in one or two places, a very satisfactory piece of work. It is doubtful, however, if the orchestra did so well in that number as they did in the two others—the "Oberon" overture of von Weber and the "Hamlet" fantasy overture of Tchikovsky. In both of these works the full force of the [illegible] and the thorough control of them by Mr. Gericke, were shown to splendid advantage.

On next Friday evening the [illegible] concert of the second series [illegible] be given and will close the orchestra's fifteenth season in this city. Mr. Adamowski will be the soloist.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 20, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Last Concert of the Monday Evening Series.

The programme for the last of this season's Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at the Academy of Music last night, consisted of Weber's overture to "Oberon;" Beethoven's concerto for the pianoforte, No. 4, in G major; Tschaikovsky's fantasy-overture, "Hamlet," and Schumann's symphony in D minor, No. 4 (the second remodeled version)—not a particularly interesting selection. The Tschaikovsky number is distinctly lugubrious, and from such a brilliant master of tone color and of orchestration, and one who has treated another theme from Shakespeare—"Romeo and Juliet"—so charmingly, it is the more disappointing. Nor is the Beethoven concerto a particularly interesting one. Still, if the programme might have been bettered it must be admitted that the choice of the pianist was a singularly happy one.

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, who played here for the first time, is undoubtedly entitled to a place in the very front rank among contemporary pianists. He has a beautiful yet virile touch, and in technique he is thoroughly well equipped. The piano in his hands becomes something more than a mere piece of mechanism, the beauty of tone and the variety of expression which he draws from it is thoroughly delightful. He played the concerto faultlessly and in such a way as to bring out all that was best in it. To judge by appearances, Mr. von Dohnanyi is quite a young man, yet he has a strongly marked individuality, happily, however, without any affectations; he has sentiment and poetic insight strongly developed, but it is a healthy sentiment, and free from effeminacy. Altogether, he is a most agreeable player to listen to; it is only to be regretted that his introduction has been deferred so late.

The orchestra played the "Oberon" overture with spirit, and kept up to their usual standard in the symphony.

On Friday evening the last concert of the season will be given, when Mr. T. Adamowski will be the soloist.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Orchestra to Be Heard Here Only Once More This Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall at its last matinee concert and to-night it will play for the last time here this season. This is not a pleasant reminder that the musical season in New York will soon come to an end as so much that has been delightful in it came from the participation of the Boston musicians. New York is fortunate to have the opportunity to listen to such music, even if it has to be enjoyed with the consciousness that it comes from another city. But it is a fact that without the concerts given here by the Boston organization New York would hear no orchestral playing worthy a city of its size and importance. It is proper, therefore, to be thankful for these visits and one admirable way to show this gratitude would be by sending somewhat larger audiences toCarnegie Hall. Yesterday afternoon the attendance was small enough to suggest that New York might not after all be a city that takes much pleasure in concerts.

The programme yesterday included the overture to Smetana's "The Bartered Bride," Lalo's Spanish symphony for violin and orchestra in D minor, Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" fantasy overture and Beethoven's symphony in A major. The solo part in the violin concerto, which might be a more accurate description of the composition, was played by Timothée Adamowski. His solid technical attainments and his musicianly feeling enabled him to play the work excellently. It is such a performance as this, on the part of a member of the orchestra, that explains its wonderful perfection as a whole. The concerto, which is full of an atmosphere and color, rare in serious musical composition is a work of a great charm in parts. Tschaikowski's "Hamlet" overture is a romantic composition of great beauty and impressiveness. Its musical reflection of the spirit of Shakespeare's tragedy may not be strong and the extent to which it accomplishes that is purely a subjective matter with every hearer, but of its melancholy beauty there can be no question. It was exquisitely played by the orchestra.

Beethoven's seventh symphony, which closed the concert, was played with the customary excellence of the orchestra, and greater praise of it can scarcely be written.

The North American

TUESDAY, MARCH 20, 1900.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

Season Closed With a Particularly Brilliant Programme.

The last Boston Symphony Orchestra concert of the season was given at the Academy of Music last evening, a large audience being present, despite the inclemency of the weather. The last concert of the season, it was also one of the best, a particularly brilliant programme having been selected for the farewell. The individual honors of the evening were won by the soloist, Ernest Von Dohany, who played Beethoven's concerto, No. 4, in G major, opus. 38, with fine effect, eliciting a storm of applause, and following it with a rippling melody which completed his conquest of the audience.

Among the numbers given by the orchestra were Weber's melodious overture, "Oberon," the weird Hamlet fantasy by Tchaikowsky and Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus. 120. This was the final number of the evening, and it gave a fitting finale to the season.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 20, 1900.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

A New Russian Pianist Plays at the Last Concert of the First Series.

The programme of the fifth and last of the first series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place last evening at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, opened with a spirited rendering of the bright and joyous "Oberon" overture of Karl Maria von Weber. This was immediately followed by the Beethoven piano concerto No. 4, in G major, with Ernst von Dohnanyi at the piano. The interest of the evening was centered in this young Russian pianist, who, even in these days when technique is taken for granted, held the large audience spell-bound by his beautiful performance. Mr. Dohnanyi plays with real artistic feeling, and his touch is so firm and smooth that it is a distinct delight to hear him. After this came the "Hamlet" fantasy-overture, op. 67, by Peter Ilyitch Tchaikowsky, a fine example of the modern restless music, with its rich orchestration. The symphony was the long Schumann No. 4, in D minor, op. 120, which was played in a very dull and colorless manner, and that it was a disappointment was evinced by the restlessness of the audience, in spite of the fact that it was barely 10 o'clock when the performance was over. The last of the second series of concerts will take place on Friday evening. The soloist will be Mr. Adamowski.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, March 20, 1900.

Boston Symphony Concert — Academy of Music.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, a youthful Hungarian pianist, rich in foreign laurels, was the soloist at last evening's Boston Symphony, and proved himself a virtuoso worthy of what has been said in his praise, and one we should like to hear again. His selection last evening was a Beethoven concerto in G major, a work which he interpreted with great technical skill and a nice sense of its musical beauty. His effects were all legitimate, and he is free from mannerisms, unless we consider as such a habit of brooding over the keyboard during his piano passages. These piano passages were particularly refined, almost too refined for the Academy's auditorium at times, while the dimuendoes and crescendoes were superb. Dohnanyi has only been playing in public for about a year, his debut having been made in London. It was he that won the prize offered in the spring of 1898 by Ludwig Bosendorfer, the great piano maker, for the best pianoforte composition as a memorial of Hans von Buelow. Outside of this new soloist's appearance the concert last evening was not particularly interesting. Schumann's beautiful symphony in D minor was beautifully played, and the programme also included Von Weber's familiar "Oberon" overture and Tchaikovsky's noisy "Hamlet" fantasy-overture.

The World.

ed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1900.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Last Afternoon Concert for the Present Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last afternoon concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday. With regret it must be recorded that the attendance was small.

Yesterday's programme was more an exhibition of the orchestra's technical perfections than it was an insight of its conductor's talents as an interpreter. The explanation for this is in the fact that Mr. Gericke was suffering from an attack of influenza and did not feel like himself. Under the conditions it would be improper to comment on the readings.

The orchestra played admirably. In Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture the strings executed the rushing fugal theme with superb virility. In the Tschaikowsky "Hamlet" fantasy the dramatic contrasts were strongly emphasized. In the Beethoven Symphony—the Seventh—the assertive rhythms were accentuated with faultless precision.

The solo number was Lalo's Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra—a work of much romantic imagination and originality. The solo part was played by Mr. T. Adamowski with varying merit. There was little authority in his formulations in the first movement. But in the lively scherzo, with its graceful waltz theme, in the andante, with its expressive cantilena, and in the saltarello-like rondo the violinist played with clever characterization and with technical finish.

New-York Daily Tribune

THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is this week paying its last visit to New-York for this season. Three concerts are on the list, and the first of these was given at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. It offered nothing in the way of novelties, but it was interesting because of the manner in which familiar music was played and in the circumstance that it enabled one of the violinists of the orchestra, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, to show himself as a solo performer in the brightest light in which he has yet appeared before the people of New-York. He played Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnol" with splendid dash and spirit, and made of it the climactic number of the afternoon's entertainment. As for the accompaniment which Mr. Gericke and his associates gave him, it was a marvel of sympathy and accuracy, and deserving of equal praise with the solo performance. The orchestral numbers were the overture to "The Bartered Bride"—a virtuoso performance of the highest rank—Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" and Beethoven's seventh symphony. Scherzo and finale of the symphony were given with splendid daintiness in the first instance and dash in the second, but lovers of the old work must have found it difficult to reconcile their feelings and prejudices with Mr. Gericke's rapid tempo in the slow movement.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Were Wilhelm Gericke an opera singer instead of the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there would have been displayed at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon a sign announcing that owing to his sudden indisposition his place would be taken by the Great Unknown. But Mr. Gericke, though suffering from a severe cold, bordering on grippe, conducted notwithstanding, and from the spirit with which the orchestra dashed into Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture no one would have imagined that their leader was indisposed.

This orchestra is fortunate in having among its members several distinguished soloists. One of these, Timothée Adamowski, played yesterday Lalo's fascinating "Spanish Symphony," for violin and orchestra. Barring certain lapses of technique, such as occasional faulty tone on high notes, Mr. Adamowski's performance was graceful, even brilliant, and he had many recalls.

In addition to the Smetana overture the orchestra played Tohaikowsky's fantasy-overture, "Hamlet," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

Mar 28

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

CONCERT IN MUSIC HALL

By the Musical Art Society of New York, Under the Direction of Frank Damrosch.

Last evening in Music Hall a concert was given by the Musical Art Society of New York, under the direction of Frank Damrosch, assisted by Wallace Goodrich, organist, and twenty-eight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was as follows:

Part 1—Crucifixus (eight-part), Antonio Lotti; Stabat Mater, Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina; (a) Caligaverunt oculi mei, Michael Haydn: (b) Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen, Michael Praetorius; Comest Thou, Light of Gladness? H. Von Herzogenberg.

Part 2—Cantata, "Ode of Mourning."

Johan Sebastian Bach, accompanied by piano, organ and orchestral.

Part 3 — Two Bohemian songs (a) Gold'ne Fluren, (b) Wiegenlied, Anton Dvorak; two Scotch Folk songs (a) Ay Wakin-O, (b) Ye Banks and Braes, arranged by H. A. Lambeth; Liebe dir ergeb' ich mich, Peter Cornelius.

Every selection was heartily applauded, but what appealed to the hearts of the hearers were the Bohemian songs by Dvorak, and especially the two Scotch folk songs, of which latter "Ye Banks and Braes" was redemanded, the only encore of the evening. The Ode of Mourning was an ovation and the concluding number by Cornelius was enthusiastically applauded. There was a very large audience, composed chiefly of the best musical people of Boston, and many of our best known musicians.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1900

Music Hall: The Musical Art Society

The Musical Art Society of New York, Mr. Frank Damrosch director, assisted by Mr. Wallace Goodrich (organist) and twenty-eight members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave a concert in the Music Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

"Crucifixus" (for eight parts)......Antonio Lotti
"Stabat Mater" (for double chorus)....Palestrina
"Caligaverunt oculi mei"..........Michael Haydn
"Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen"..........Michael Prætorius
"Comest thou, light of gladness"..........H. von Herzogenberg
Funeral Ode..........J. S. Bach
Two Bohemian Songs—
"Gold'ne Fluren,"
Wiegenlied,..........Dvorak
Two Scotch Folk-Songs—
"Ay wakin', O,"
"Ye banks and braes,"..arr. by H. A. Lambeth
"Liebe, dir ergeb' ich mich".....Peter Cornelius

Accounts of how this society originated, and of the excellent work done by it in New York during the last five years, have been published in these columns from time to time in the course of the last fortnight or so. This was the society's first appearance in Boston, for matter of that, the first time that Mr. Frank Damrosch has done anything in this city. The occasion was in every way an interesting, in most ways a delightful one. It was good to see a large audience gathered to greet our visitors, better still to find them in an enthusiastic mood, throwing off that chilly solemnity with which Boston used to give icy welcome to strangers in the times of yore.

The chorus of the society numbers fifty-three singers, all paid professionals, with good, well-trained voices and (de jure as well as de facto) willing to submit to arduous rehearsing. Mr. Frank Damrosch, the conductor of the society, makes good the favorable reports that have come to us of him from time to time; judging by what he did last evening, one has no hesitation in recognizing him as not only an experienced conductor, thoroughly master of the technics of his art, but a born conductor as well, with a natural gift for it. The result is as might have been expected; the chorus sings truly admirably, with both force and beauty of vocal tone, security, accuracy of rhythm, well-graded effects of light and shade, and exceptionally true intonation. Mr. Damrosch has collected and trained a fine instrument in this chorus, and does with it what he pleases.

In view of the rare excellence of singers and conductor, it was a pity that our city could not offer them the hospitality of a decent organ. That unspeakable instrument which has so long peeked into a corner of the Music Hall is well calculated to foil the best musical endeavors; Mr. Goodrich, almost an ideal organist for the situation, both by instinct and experience, can do much, but he cannot do the impossible. That is the trouble with music; it is like cookery, one wrong ingredient can spoil the whole broth! With one instrument out of tune, a whole orchestra, and chorus to boot, is thrown hopelessly out of kilter; and, when that instrument is an organ, in tune neither with itself nor with anything else, the result is disastrous. We have all lamented the vileness of this organ, for our own sakes; but when it comes to having to offer it to visitors we can only blush.

Another unfortunate circumstance—which is not new to us here—was that only one rehearsal could be had with the orchestra. But this is an old story; to alter its catastrophe would take more money than any society I know of has to spend.

Interesting and delightful as the chorus itself and Mr. Damrosch were, the music they brought us was still more so. Let it not be deemed invidious to say this; no matter how fine performers may be, they are never in a more normal position than in giving precedence to the music they perform.

The first part of the programme was made up of selections from the older sacred music for unaccompanied chorus. I might have called it a cappella music without further ado, were it not for one consideration which forced itself upon my mind with peculiar distinctness last evening. In general, the a cappella style is associated with the strict contrapuntists of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries; and last evening I could not but feel a peculiar fitness in thus limiting the term. I am speaking now of immediate impressions, not in the least influenced by preconceived ideas; I speak merely of how the music impressed me at the time.

Of the five unaccompanied things sung, four at least were distinctly fine and beautiful; works of men who were thorough masters of the styles in which they severally wrote. Well, the only one of these five compositions in which I could feel that the executive means employed by the composer were thoroughly and uniquely adequate to the style in which he wrote was the Palestrina "Stabat Mater"; and this happened to be the only one that was in the strict a cappella style—with the limitation of the term mentioned above. This wonderful "Stabat Mater" is in the strict modal counterpoint of the best period of the sixteenth century, the period in which the style reached its culmination. And I do not think that it was only Palestrina's superior genius, the feeling that he could put the four other men in his pocket (strong though this feeling was), that gave this impression of the absolute adequacy of the means to the artistic intention. I think it was more the style itself than anything else. The "Stabat Mater" rang out as a thing utterly complete in itself, from which nothing could be subtracted, to which nothing could be added, without diminishing its lustre. It was totus teres atque rotundus!

Surely it were hard to imagine anything more soulful, more admirably written, than Lotti's "Crucifixus"; it is a dream of beauty. But here something of modern tonality keeps cropping up, with modern harmony, modern individuality of emotion—which contrasts so sharply with Palestrina's wholly impersonal mysticism—and the unaccompanied chorus seemed no longer quite adequate to the situation. I kept longing for an orchestra, for the sub-bass of an

The thing is no longer conceived in the pure old a cappella spirit, but in the spirit of the stilo concertante of Lotti's day; and the combination of voices with instruments, the support of orchestral tone, is an essential factor of this style. I felt the same with the things by Michael Haydn and Praetorius; there was not that absolutely satisfying completeness of impression produced by the Palestrina thing. When it came to the number by von Herzogenberg—the ingenious gentleman who has probably broken the record for doing execrable work in filling out Bach scores—with its alternation of styles running all the way from Arcadelt to Massenet, the effect was almost comic.

Why was Bach's "Trauer-Ode" called an "Ode of Mourning"? A "Trauer-Marsch" is a funeral march, a "Trauer-Wagen" a funeral coach; then why should not a "Trauer-Ode" be a funeral ode? The composition was not given entire, nor otherwise in its original shape; two recitatives and four airs were omitted and the chorals interpolated by Rust were sung. Moreover, the recitatives given were sung, not as solos, but by all the respective voices in unison. Considering, however, what solo singers today do with Bach and Handel recitatives, this last was no hardship; the effect was even singularly fine and solemn. I wish every oratorio singer present would make a note of it.

The work is of infinite beauty and expressive depth. It shows Bach fairly at his greatest. Some changes had to be made in the orchestration; the viola da gamba parts were played on 'celli, the oboe d'amore parts, on English horns, and the lute parts, on a pianoforte. With this I have no disposition to quarrel; little can have been lost thereby. Only, would not the harp have been a better substitute for the lute than a pianoforte? I can not say that I really know what a lute sounds like; but I will go bail that it does not sound like a modern pianoforte, for (thank heaven!) nothing under the sun sounds like that. But the pianoforte was a great help in that astounding "bell" recitative; and this is probably why it was used throughout.

The work could not make quite the impression the Palestrina "Stabat Mater" did; it was too sorely handicapped. I have said that the organ was out of tune; at the beginning, the orchestra was no better, the wind instruments being lamentably "off." That is the trouble with a Bach cantata; generations of musicians have gone wild over it, it looks absolutely divine in the score, and, when you hear it, it sounds like the devil! Somehow flutes do not seem able to tune for a Bach cantata. To be sure, the instruments got into better tune as the work wore on, and, by the time the final chorus came, all save the organ was as it should be. Apart from the frequently impure intonation, the orchestra did some very good playing indeed; the chorus sang superbly. I can not like the unaccompanied chorals; in a Bach choral I want everything, yes, everything, to play with the chorus. I do not like being reminded of a four-part song—even of a supremely fine one. In most of the chorals in his cantatas Bach distinctly indicates the coöperation of orchestra and organ; and I doubt if he distinctly commands their absence in a single case. That the one choral sung with organ (but without orchestra) last evening did not sound particularly well was the fault of the organ, and proves nothing.

Of the third part of the concert, made up of unaccompanied part-songs, I need not speak further than to say that the singing was exquisite. But it would take more than that to reconcile me to a part-song sung by chorus; with four solo voices I can stand it, but a chorus—well, that is my partial depravity.

But let Mr. Damrosch be thanked heartily for the feast he came on here to give us. He carries golden opinions back to New York, and we shall all be more than glad to greet him again. W. F. A.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1900.

ITS FIRST IN BOSTON

Mr. Damrosch's Club in Music Hall.

Musical Art Society Sings.

The Program Was Most Varied.

The Musical Art Society of New York, Mr. Frank Damrosch, conductor, sang here for the first time in Music Hall last evening. It was assisted by Mr. J. Wallace Goodrich, organist, and members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The story of the origin of this society has already been told by the Journal. The society is composed of about 50 carefully chosen singers, who are paid for time spent in rehearsal and in concert. The society was founded in December, 1893. The formidable list of directors, associate directors, founders, subscribers to the founders' fund, members and associate members was printed at length in the program-book.

The program was as follows:

Crucifixus (eight-part)..........Lotti
Stabat Mater..........Palestrina
Caligaverunt oculi mei.........Michael Haydn
Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen..........Michael Praetorius
Comest Thou, Light of Gladness?........Herzogenberg
Cantata, "Ode of Mourning". ....Bach
Gold'ne Fluren..........Anton Dvorak
Wiegenlied..........Anton Dvorak
Ay Wakin O!..........Arranged by Lambeth
Ye Banks and Braes..Arranged by Lambeth
Liebe dir ergeb' ich mich..........Cornelius

Genuine Pleasure.

The first genuine pleasure was awakened by the fine performance of Haydn's "Caligaverunt Oculi mei." The music itself is more grateful to modern ears than are the pieces that preceded under the conditions which necessarily attended. The music of Palestrina and composers of that class is foreign to men and women of this period, first of all on account of the absence of the tonalities to which the latter are accustomed. Under proper conditions it is the highest and purest type of religious music, for it makes no direct appeal, it is free from the suspicion of earthly feeling or emotion, it is as a thing enskied and mystic. In a cathedral, sung by singers trained in the traditions, the effect is irresistible, o'erpowering to any hearer of imagination and sympathy. In a shabby hall, shabby in spite of the brave attempt last night to make it less bleak and forbidding, with glaring lights and not one circumstance of architectural beauty, worship, or tradition, this music must make its way unaided; there is absolutely nothing to put the average hearer in sympathetic mood. The musician may wonder at the marvelous weaving together of voices, at the incredible polyphonic skill, at the pure spirit of the composer, but unless he be a man of rare spiritual concentration the music is to him chiefly a contrapuntal masterpiece. No matter how well it may be sung, there is little or no thought in the audience of the solemn service for which it was written. Then, too, you must take into consideration the great difficulties that attend the performance of such music; and you have a right to doubt whether a conductor, unless he has made a special study of such music under a master who is acquainted thoroughly with traditions, can interpret with due attention to the indispensable and approved nuances, with unerring accuracy in the matter of tempo.

Lotti and Palestrina.

For these reasons I say of the performance of the pieces by Lotti and Palestrina only this: There was a highly creditable attempt, and there was an opportunitp given many to gain at least some idea of masterpieces of ancient vocal composition.

But the first genuine interest was in hearing the music of Michael Haydn. Here the listener was reminded of the sorrows and longings and hopes of poor humanity, and the musical expression was no longer an exotic language, or the quiring of celestial and mystic voices.

The same may be said in varying degree of the choruses that followed, although it was a pity to find the society wasting time on the two pieces by Dvorák. Take Bach's "Ode of Mourning," for instance, which was sung without the arias and with the omission of two recitatives. The first recitative that was sung was dull and dreary, but how dramatic the second, "From Lofty Towers!" How noble the fugued chorus, how inspiring, how positive—I might well say muscular—and triumphant in its faith! And the chorales are for the most part indescribably beautiful.

The society shows the results of careful training, in attack and release of chords, in the sustaining of phrases, in dynamic gradations. The quality of tone was not strikingly rich in any part, nor were the parts invariably well balanced, but there was true musical strength in forte passages, and there was always the thought of reserve strength. The intonation in the music by Lotti, Palestrina and Bach was not always pure, but the difficulties in the "Crucifixus" and the "Stabat Mater" are great. On the whole, the society made a very favorable impression and New York may well be congratulated on having such a beneficent factor in its musical life. The singers and conductor were heartily applauded by a good-sized audience, and it is to be hoped that they will honor this city henceforth with a yearly visit.

Philip Hale.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII., NO. 87.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1900.

MUSICAL ART SOCIETY.

The New York Singing Organization Heard at Music Hall Last Evening—Well Received.

The Musical Art Society of New York, Mr. Frank Damrosch, director, made its first appearance in this city, at Music Hall, last evening. The organization has been in existence for six years, this being its seventh season. Its main object appears to be the performance of vocal music by the older masters that would otherwise remain unheard. In the course of its career up to this date it has given a large number of unfamiliar compositions by Palestrina, Orlando di Lasso, Josquin de Pres, Allegri, Bach, Lotti and others of the early school, as well as selections from more recent musicians. It consists of some 60 professional soloists, and its aim is lofty.

Its programme last evening was:

Crucifixus..........Lotti
Stabat Mater..........Palestrina
Caligaverunt oculi mei........Michael Haydn
Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen..Michael Praetorius
Comest Thou, Light of Gladness..........H. von Herzogenberg
Ode of Mourning..........J. S. Bach
"Gold'ne Fluren" and Wiegdnlier".....Dvorak
"Ay Wakin O!" and "Ye Banks and Braes," arranged by H. A. Lambeth.
Liebe dir ergeb' ich mich........P. Cornelius

The singing, with the exception of the Bach cantata, was all unaccompanied: in other words, a capella. Mr. Wallace Goodrich was at the organ, and there were 28 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the instrumental element in the Bach work.

The Palestrina Stabat Mater, one of the most beautiful of the composer's masterpieces, would, of itself, have made the concert one of exceptional interest. The easy flow of its wonderful harmonies, the exquisite interweaving of the voices, and the noble simplicity of the whole combine to make this setting of the poem searchingly impressive. It bears its age—three hundred and odd years—with surprising vigor and freshness. Its effect in the surroundings for which it was intended must be overwhelming. The Bach cantata, which was composed to commemorate the death of the wife of the Elector of Saxony, was given in an abridged form, the solos being omitted, and only the choruses, the chorales and some of the recitatives being sung. The result was somewhat monotonous. The Michael Haydn selection was among the more purely beautiful works of the evening, and as it was also the music in which the singers acquitted themselves most perfectly in regard to smoothness, tone, color and sentiment, its charm was potent.

As for the singing of the society, it was creditable, but by no means remarkable. It emits a smooth and excellent volume of tone; but there seemed to be a due balance lacking somewhere, and a need for strengthening one of the parts, apparently the contraltos. Nor was the intonation always true, the singers showing a marked tendency to flat, especially on subsiding from a forte to a piano. Then, too, some of the soprano voices seemed worn, especially in their attack of a high note. Taken altogether, the chorus has scarcely the freshness and brilliancy of tone that is displayed by the Cecilia. However, it sang with steadiness and precision, its coloring was admirable, and its pianissimo of exquisite purity. The least praiseworthy singing of the concert was heard in the chorales of the Bach cantata, in which the sopranos in particular were now uneven and now explosive in tone.

All things considered, the performances were in the main interesting, and the visit of the strangers was valuable in showing us what has been achieved elsewhere in choral work, notably by the representative chorus of New York. It was also important as a suggestion to our own singing societies to enlarge their sphere of usefulness in making known the wealth of music that they have hitherto neglected; or that they have ignored since the Boylston Club, some years ago, made an effort to revive, without meeting with the encouragement it deserved.

The audience last evening gave the newcomers a cordial welcome, and its applause was hearty and warmly appreciative. Mr. Damrosch conducted with ability and authority, and is to be thanked for having given Boston an opportunity to hear his chorus, which is so much esteemed in New York, and the noble music that formed so large a part of his fine programme.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAR. 28, 1900.

A GRAND CHORUS.

Musical Art Society of New York Sings in Music Hall.

It has been long years, if ever, since the ears of musical Boston have been so gloriously assailed as during last evening at Music Hall, when that famous mixed choir of professional singers, the Musical Art Society of New York, under the direction of Frank Damrosch, gave a programme of unsurpassed beauty and richness. Long, long may it be again before our cup, so often brimming, runs over again!

It has not been altogether the fault of Boston that it has not brought forth such sweetness from its own strength. We have not the numbers of the metropolis. Where could we draw on for 60 or, indeed, 25 professional voices of like excellence to these? It is only within 6 yrs. that Mr. Damrosch, full of zeal, has drawn together and moulded into a whole his famous body of singers. Before that even his enthusiasm quailed at the idea of Palestrina. M. Haydn and Bach in the mouths of amateurs. The very austerity, the noble serenity and largeness of the music demanded more than mere numbers could furnish. With this purpose, he aimed at the highest.

Let imitation attest the measure of his success; in many cities musical societies patterned upon this are springing up. The whole country will be leavened in time. And this was the conductor's ambition, to bring before the public a class of composition practically unknown, but of great beauty, the works of Palestrina and his school, of Bach and the more modern masters of a capella music.

To interpret this character of composition, Mr. Damrosch has brought together a chorus of fine material—finer never sang here. Every member is rated as a soloist. Under his intelligent direction they have become almost organic. To describe them as displaying an ensemble remarkable alike in tempo and force, and as clothing the mechanics of their art with the most exalted purity of tone and certainty of expression, is to say scarcely more than half the truth. So faultless was the melody that in the times the voices blended, it was as if one grand, heroic, mobile voice rang out. One had only to shut the eyes to believe it.

The programme has been praised. It thus made up: 1. Crucifixus (8-part), A. Lotti; Stabat Mater, G. P. da Palestrina; Caligaverunt oculi mei, M. Haydn; Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen, M. Praetorius; Comest Thou, Light of Gladness? H. Von Herzogenberg; Cantata, "Ode of Mourning," J. S. Bach. 2. Bohemian Songs, Gold'ne Fluren. Wiegenlied, A. Dvorak; 2. Scotch Folk-Songs, Ay Wakin O! Ye Banks and Braes, arranged by H. A. Lambeth; Liebe dir ergeb' ich mich, P. Cornelius.

There comes a time in music, as well as in other arts and sciences, when it is urgent to stop, adjust the compass and note how far the elements have drawn the vessel from its course. The programme of, for the most part, early music, built up on the simple diatonic scale, guileless of modern chromatic eccentricities, eerie dissonances and rushing homophonic blares, has the value of an historic perspective. Here the earliest masters started, and in lofty sublimity, moving serenity, dignity without mystery or without harshness, have never been surpassed.

If these sentiments have not gone out of our lives, if human nature still responds with admiration to their suggestion, it is fitting that we should become familiar with them, and as the branches of a wide-spreading tree follow overhead its roots under the ground, so by hovering over these sentiments we shall keep our musical genius broad and sane.

The opposition of the 2 modes, old and new, deepens the significance of both, and after such an evening as the last it is not to the modern that the thoughts come back. These beautiful, old-time compositions are like the Greek marbles. They give us the conception of another sphere, where strenuousness is not the chief end of life.

There are no shimmering triplets, no glaring contrasts, no rushing chromatics. The ear is soothed by flowing melody while it is occupied in analyzing the beauty of construction. There is again reminder that evolution was not all catastrophy; and so there is stimulation in these cool, starry compositions of the elder masters.

The Crucifixus of Lotti was sung with the most perfect clarity of intonation, a round, rich smoothness that somehow seemed almost as sacred as the subject.

The "Stabat Mater" was beyond satisfaction. It was distinguished by the grand simplicity and whole-souled melody which befits it. There was not a flaw in the performance, not a stumble in the attack of a phrase, not the flutter of an intonation. Admiration halts for words. Only the most thorough drilling, the most painstaking devotion could have accomplished such wonders.

It was a repetition of fulsome eulogy to recount the numbers. It may be remarked that in the Von Herzogenberg Motett a tenor division of uncommon strength and quality was disclosed, and lent especial interest to an otherwise beautiful composition.

The Bach "Ode of Mourning" had the organ (Mr. Wallace Goodrich) and 28 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to support the chorus. It was, as the book suggested, cut to the choruses and 2 recitatives, two of the recitatives and the 4 arias being omitted. Though this naturally diminished the effect of the work as appeal to all of the sentiments, it did not affect its value as describing several sides of Bach's genius or as exhibiting the capability of the chorus. In the fragments presented there are many shades of expression, from despair, through dolor and abstraction to religious exaltation. The opportunity is one never to be forgotten.

The 2 Dvorak pieces were pretty cradle songs, cosily cuddled in with the 2 Scotch songs, before the noble Cornelius composition. "Ye Banks and Braes" was granted an encore, least satisfactory though it was. One cannot feel the sentiment by hearing it chanted in chorus.

"Liebe, dir Ergeb' ich Mich" brought nobly this noble evening to a close. Deep and fervorous it was throughout, but in the last stanzas there was some deep-chested, full-throated singing that stamped the occasion and made it current for days and months to come.

Boston Daily Globe.
WEDNESDAY, MAR. 28, 1900

MUSICAL ART SOCIETY.

Singers from New York City Display Great Skill in Choral Singing Under Direction of Mr Frank Damrosch.

In Music hall last evening the Musical Art society of New York gave an illustration of skill in choral work which was notable, even in this city which can boast of several societies that have attained high rank in this form of musical art. The New York choir, now in its seventh season, comprises about 60 professional singers, who under the direction of Mr Frank Damrosch, have given to the public a class of vocal composition which requires the cooperation of professional singers in order to do full justice to the noblest works ever written for the church. The difficulties and intricacies of the writings demand great vocal skill for proper interpretation, and so Mr Damrosch organized the present society from the ranks of professional singers, his object being to attain so far as possible an ideal standard of choral singing. The membership of the society comprises many ladies and gentlemen prominent in the social and musical circles in New York city, and the influence of the organization throughout this country has been very great, typifying as it does the purest and loftiest forms of musical art.

Last evening's audience was quite large, enthusiastic and unmistakably fashionable, and the usually barren stage and back wall were decorated with palms and festoons of green. The ladies and gentlemen of the society were in evening dress, and all of the numbers on the program, except the Bach cantata, were sung without instrumental accompaniment. The program was as follows: "Crucifixus," Antonio Lotti; "Stabat Mater," Palestrina; "Caligaverunt oculi mei," Michael Haydn; "Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen," Michael Praetorius; "Comest Thou, Light of Gladness?" H. Von Herzogenberg; cantata, "Ode of Mourning," Bach; "Gold'ne Fluren" and "Wiegenlied," Dvorak; Scotch folk songs, arranged by H. A. Lambeth; "Ay Wakin O!" and "Ye Banks and Braes;" "Liebe dir ergeb' ich mich," Peter Cornelius. The orchestra was made up of symphony men.

The principal part of the program was devoted to ancient compositions, religious in import and of marked intrinsic merit. The voices in the society are admirably balanced, and if there is any fault to find it is with the tenor contingent, that body at times not seeming able to preserve its proper tonal relations with the other voice parts. The execution, so far as lights and shades and attack are concerned, was splendid in almost every instance, and the volume of harmony, when the size of the organization is remembered, was of splendid resonance and sonority. The "Stabat Mater," by Palestonia, that magnificent example of secular music, was sung with grand effect, the precision and promptness of the entering voice parts being notably bold and unwavering. Throughout the evening there was no uncertainty in vocal attack, and the proper effects were given as they should be; at the outset, and not as is frequently the case with amateur singers, as sort of anticlimax.

The Bach "Ode to Mourning" possibly was given in a manner rather precise, some parts of the work being omitted because of its great length, but no fault could be found with the singing of the choruses beginning "O, Child of Sin" and "Lord Jesus Christ," both of which deserve high praise. Of the lighter selections Dvørak's "Gold'ne Fluren" should be mentioned as deserving greatest commendation for finish and delicacy of treatment, but Lambeth's choral setting "Ye Banks and Braes" evidently was the greater favorite, receiving an encore. The other numbers call for no special mention, aside from the fact that the same high musicianship was evident in each. Mr Damrosch had double recalls, at least, after every number and the brief part allotted the symphony men in the Bach cantata was consciencioiusly performed.

The society dined in a body at the Parker house, previous to the concert, and after it was over they returned to the hotel for supper, leaving for New York at midnight.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII., NO. 88.
THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1900.

It is to be hoped the fair members of New York's Musical Art Society have not taken home a collection of "colds"; but if those decollete ladies don't have pneumonia they are lucky! The reputation of our beloved Music Hall is none of the best in regard to ventilation, for it is as icy as a tomb, while an audience can be asphyxiated as easy as turn your hand over. In short, there never was such an auditorium for destructive draughts as Music Hall, and when I saw those bare arms and shoulders filing on to the stage I prayed heaven might temper the wind to the shorn lambs. Somebody should have warned these strangers that high necks and long sleeves, not to mention fur shoulder capes, were needful to health and comfort in that shabby and sacred hall. But just wait a bit. If we only survive till next season, we shall not have to run risks of taking every manner of cold. It must be said of the concert last Tuesday night that the stage was highly decorated, and the smart gowns were not the least of it. Boston's eye, accustomed to the Handel and Haydn and Cecilia choruses, fairly blinked with delight at the—well, the difference. But we can't have everything, can we?

Of course nothing except wild horses will keep young music loving society away from the Dohnanyi recital, so there's no need of mentioning the date or the programme. This youthful artist, however, will have no chance of being spoiled by feminine adulation, for he remains only a brief time over here. Europe claims him, although another season he promises to visit us again, for he, too, is charmed by the cordial reception given to him everywhere. It was due to a special invitation of the conductor of the Symphony orchestra that Ernest von Dohnanyi crossed the ocean to give Boston that delightful surprise at the last concert. Thanks, then, to Mr. Gericke, for this good judgment, as well as for his protege.

Overheard at Music Hall: "Doesn't this remind you of 'The Wooing of Phyllis'? 'Now, tenors!'"

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Appearance of Ernst von Dohnanyi a New Star Among Pianists.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Infantry Hall. There was a good attendance, a fine programme and an unusual degree of enthusiasm was evoked by the superb performance of Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, a new star in the pianistic firmament. In the absence of Mr. Gericke, owing to illness contracted while on tour during the past week, Mr. Franz Kneisel conducted. The loss of the regular conductor was not apparent, however, so far as the work of the orchestra was concerned, for the playing was fully up to the usual high standard, and the concert as a whole was one of the most enjoyable of the series. The programme included the following numbers:

Symphony in G-major, "Oxford" (Peters, No. 9; Rieter-Biedermann, No. 2) ....Josef Haydn
- I. Adagio (G-major)
  Allegro spiritoso (G-major).
- II. Adagio (D-major).
- III. Minuetto: Allegretto (G-major).
  Trio (G-major).
- IV. Presto (G-major).

Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G-major, Op. 58..............Ludwig van Beethoven
- I. Allegro moderato (G-major).
- II. Andante con moto (E-minor).
- III. Rondo: Vivace (G-major).
  (Cadenzas by Mr. Dohnanyi.)

Suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt," Op. 46........Edvard Hagerup Grieg
- I. Morning Mood: Allegro pastorale (E-major).
- II. Aase's Death: Andante doloroso (B-minor).
- III. Anitra's Dance: Tempo di Mazurka (A-minor).
- IV. In the Hall of the Mountain King; the imps are chasing Peer Gynt: Alla marcia e molto marcato (B-minor).

Overture to "Oberon"..Karl Maria von Weber

In the arrangement of the programme a return was made to the style of previous seasons in placing the symphony first, a custom which has been violated in the preceding concerts of this year. The change has never been popular, and the return last night to the former mode of arrangement was noted with pleasure. In listening to an orchestral concert from an hour and a half to two hours in duration, the longer and more intricate work, which naturally calls for the closest and most sustained effort of attention, is heard to better advantage at the beginning, when the brain of the listener is neither tired by prolonged strain nor distracted by recurring images of what has gone before.

The symphony of Haydn's, which was chosen to open the programme, is one seldom played nowadays. Nevertheless, it is one of the best of that eminent master's many contributions to symphonic literature. Despite a certain thinness of instrumentation common to all the works of that period, due to the practical absence of brass (except horns) and the consequent prominence given to the string department, the symphony is a very melodious and interesting work. And then, Haydn certainly knew how to write for the strings if any man ever did. The work was played with great delicacy and precision.

Grieg's "Peer Gynt" suite is always a welcome number, and this, too, has not been heard recently. Its four finely contrasted movements, each a gem in itself, are among the finest specimens of "programme music," and never fail of warm recognition. None of the moderns have succeeded in producing anything more original or startling than the famous closing movement of this suite, which some one has termed "a veritable musical hornet's nest." It was played with all the requisite dash and power. A brilliant performance of Weber's tremendously effective "Oberon" overture brought the concert to a close.

The soloist for the evening was Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the latest pianistic sensation, who made his debut in this country two weeks ago, and who has been greeted with a unanimous chorus of praise from the critics. It is difficult to speak of his work without going into superlatives, for, indeed, he is in many ways one of the most remarkable players we have heard in recent years. There is a finish and maturity in his achievements which one could not reasonably expect when his years are taken into consideration, unless we admit that genius is not amenable to the usual limitations of time. He is entirely free from tricks and mannerisms. His admirable technic is to him but the vehicle to convey the real meaning of the music as he conceives the composer to have intended it. A remarkable feature of his playing, on the technical side, is his wonderfully clear and evenly graded touch, in which no pianist, not even De Pachmann or Paderewski, excels him. This gives him unusual command of pianissimo effects, yet he does not indulge in unseemly or exaggerated contrast. At the same time, his fortissimo is peculiarly effective, powerful and commanding, without ever degenerating into mere noise. The concerto of Beethoven's, in which he elected to make his debut, is a fine work, and one especially fitted to bring out his peculiar excellencies as pianist and interpreter. Altogether, his performance was a masterly one, and fully deserved the vigorous recalls which followed.

Mr. Dohnanyi has some reputation already as a composer, and the cadenzas which he used were of his own making. They are musicianly and appropriate. As was said by Mr. Perabo, the well-known pianist, when Dohnanyi played this same work in Boston: "It is a great and pleasant duty to call attention to the superior performance of Mr. Dohnanyi in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto. The interpretation is wholly free from modern frailties, the expression nobly natural and the tempo just right, shedding a holy light over the many intimate nooks on these sacred premises. The interpolated portions are also most interesting. After the main work is shut off by the hold in the orchestra, the modern cadenza usually starts out with plenty of ammunition in both pockets to fight Indians, causing enthusiasm among the groundlings (who cannot distinguish between an artist and a subscriber), chasing phantom Sioux or even planting flowers 'that bloom in the spring, and have nothing to do with the case.' Not so with Mr. Dohnanyi. His cadenza is related to the subjects of the movement, narrated in a poetic and interesting way by the soloist, adding fresh buds to the healthy plant and using the composer's invitation to do so with tenderness and discretion."

The seventh concert by the Symphony Orchestra will be given on the evening of Wednesday, April 11.

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

Boston Journal.
FRIDAY, MARCH 30, 1900.

ANOTHER IN THE JOURNAL'S SERIES OF PORTRAITS.

MARIE BREMA.

Marie Brema (Braun) was born at Liverpool. Her father was a German, and some say that her mother was a Virginian. She began as an actress; at first in amateur theatricals in Liverpool, and then she made her début in "Adrienne Lecouvreur" at Oxford, June, 1891, in Henry Arthur Jones's company. She had meanwhile studied singing under Bessie Cox and Henschel, and she made her first appearance as a singer at a Monday "Pop" concert at London in February, 1891. Her operatic début was as Lola in "Cavalleria Rusticana," London, Oct. 19, 1891. She then sang Orpheus, and she traveled in a concert company with Gérardy and Plunket Greene. After other appearances in opera and oratorio, a pupil of Alfred Blume, she went to Germany, learned the part of Kundry under Levi and sang it and Ortrude at Bayreuth in 1894. Her fame soon spread and since then she has appeared in opera and concert in leading cities of Europe. Her first appearance in Boston was April 1, 1895, as Brangaene in the first performance of "Tristan und Isolde" in this city. Her son, a bass baritone, was married to Rose Ettinger, an American coloratura singer, in December of last year.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1900.

Music in Brooklyn.

A POSTER up in the lobby of the Academy of Music last Saturday evening announced the illness of Mr. Gericke. It was the closing concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Brooklyn this season. Instead of the regular conductor, the baton was wielded by Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister, and very skilfully wielded, too. It was stated that Mr. Gericke became seriously ill in Philadelphia on Friday night with the grip, and being unable to travel, the orchestra proceeded to Brooklyn without him. As the Brooklyn concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are but a repetition of the concerts given the same week in Manhattan an extended criticism in the Brooklyn notes is superfluous. The readers of THE MUSICAL COURIER will find on another page of this issue excellent reports of the concerts in Manhattan. Dohnányi, the young Hungarian pianist, who succeeded in capturing New York, Boston and Philadelphia, was also the soloist in Brooklyn, and great was the reception extended to this rarely gifted young man. As at the concert at Carnegie Hall last Thursday evening, Dohnányi played the Beethoven Concerto in G major and his performance of it was incomparably beautiful and finished. The orchestral numbers in the Brooklyn concert were the overture to Weber's "Oberon," three of the Moorish dances from Paine's opera, "Azara," and the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven.

* * *

PHILADELPHIA OFFICE THE MUSICAL COURIER,
4230 Regent Square, March 24, 1900.

THE week we have the Boston Symphony here is, for obvious reasons, a very quiet one locally. The program of the first concert on Monday night was one that failed to meet the approval of many critics as well as the general public. It was somewhat heavy through lack of contrast, which the orchestra, as a rule, gives us in the programs. However, one's tendency to grow weary was soon dismissed at the appearance of the new pianist, Ernst von Dohnányi. Yes, it was this very appearance that aroused one's interest from the start. Mr. Dohnányi, instead of adopting the usual tactics of the virtuoso, walked as unassumingly and quietly to his place at the piano as though he were a member of the orchestra. And then, too, his personal appearance was a delightful change, both his hair and coat sleeve were cut an ordinary length, the one, neatly brushed, the other showing a good expanse of cuff. As an artist, Mr. Dohnányi may be spoken of in the highest terms. His technic, clear and firm, does not, however, overshadow his powers of expression, the variety and depth of which completely won his audience.

Friday night was the second concert, the last of the series for this season, and most enjoyable it was. I unfortunately missed the "Bartered Bride" overture, and the first movement of Mr. Adamowski's solo, owing to the fact that Mr. Comee, the manager, had been called over to the Walton on business while a group of shivering reporters in the draughty corridor awaited his return. I was lazily watching Mr. Adamowski's acknowledgments of the applause after the second movement in the Spanish Symphony when I became conscious of a sudden exit of flying coattails—there was a sudden buzzing among the men, and the audience, too, for that matter, and the announcement made that owing to the sudden illness of Mr. Gericke, the concertmeister, Mr. Kneisel, would conduct the concert, which he proceeded to do, with the baton gracefully held between his thumb and first finger, to the evident satisfaction of those present.

By the way, I wish there was some way by which an audience could express sympathy. It seemed so heartless to greet the announcement of Mr. Gericke's sickness with a round of applause; yet we all wanted to extend a cordial welcome to Mr. Kneisel upon his assuming the baton, a thing I cannot recollect happening here before.

Mr. Adamowski's reading of the Spanish Symphony by Lalo was masterful in every respect, and he excelled himself in the last movement. The other numbers on the program were Paine's ballet music from the opera "Azara," dainty and weird, and Brahms' beautiful Symphony No. 2.

Music in Baltimore.

There is but one regret connected with the Boston Symphony concerts here—that there are but five each season. The final one for this year took place at Music Hall last Tuesday evening.

So that, for those of us who have not the good fortune to summer abroad there will be a music famine until next November.

Of course there are a few more good concerts to come, but the Symphony concerts are naturally the events of our season.

The program last Tuesday evening opened with the Schumann Symphony, No. 4, in D minor. Then followed Beethoven's G major Concerto for piano, played by Ernst von Dohnányi; the "Hamlet" Fantaisie, overture of Tschaikowsky and the overture to the "Bartered Bride" of Smetana.

The symphony was read and played unsurpassably. A magnificent performance was given the stupendous "Hamlet" overture, to which no better contrast could have been found than the fascinating one to the "Bartered Bride," which brought to a close a great concert.

Dohnányi gave a scholarly and reverent reading of the Beethoven Concerto. Probably the most admirable quality of his performance was the absolute subordination of mere technic (though a remarkable one) to the higher and better means of expression.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

THE final two of the series of ten concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given at Carnegie Hall Wednesday afternoon and Thursday evening of last week. The attendance was large at both functions and the manager, Mr. Comee, informed a representative of THE MUSICAL COURIER that the New York season has been a profitable one. For several years it seemed as if this unique organization would have to discontinue its visits to our city, but the splendid artistic standard and the discouraging playing of the Philarmonic Society have proved potent factors in the success of the band from Boston. That a city of the enormous wealth of Greater New York does not support an orchestra of superior quality is a disgrace. We have our Higginsons, no doubt, but they are too modest to come forward and testify in a financial manner their love of music in its noblest form—the symphonic orchestra.

The program of the Wednesday matinee was as follows:

Overture to the Bartered Bride	Smetana
Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, in D minor, op. 21	Lalo
Hamlet, Fantasy-Overture, op. 67	Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 7, in A major, op. 92	Beethoven

Soloist, T. Adamowski.

The Smetana overture is a familiar property of all virtuoso orchestras. Its dainty, chattering themes and ingenious counterpoint—it derives from Mozart and Gluck—were delicately outlined by Mr. Gericke. For the so-called Spanish Symphony of Lalo we have little sympathy. In the hands of a Sarasate or a Loeffler—the latter introduced it here with this organization—it has a certain superficial grace, but the music in it is skin deep, its themes are weak, and the Spanish coloring smudged on. The piece was played by one of the first violins. Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" is not his most virile, interesting or well-made work, but it is Tschaikowsky-ian in its cantabile, and the "ghost" theme is very effective. The entrance of Fortinbras; indicated in the march measures, is characteristically contrived. This and the Seventh Symphony received a most finished reading. Mr. Gericke's propensity for getting a variety of tonal values was not missing, and there was rude energy withal in the final allegro of the Beethoven number.

At the Thursday evening concert the following was the program:

Symphony No. 36, in C major (Koechl, No. 425) (B. & H., No. 6)	Mozart
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in G major, op. 58	Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra, op. 30	Richard Strauss
Overture to Oberon	Weber

Soloist, Ernst von Dohnányi.

Owing to the severe indisposition of Mr. Gericke—which resulted finally in his being compelled to forego the direction of the Philadelphia concert last Friday—the extremely interesting Mozart Symphony was withdrawn and Schumann's fourth in D minor substituted. The writer listened with marked pleasure to the Mozart work, given in Boston week before last. Of it W. F. Apthorp wrote:

"This symphony stands as No. 6 (op. 34) in Breitkopf & Härtel's first edition of the score. It is marked No. 5 in the four-hand piano arrangement by Jules André, published by André in Offenbach. It was composed certainly before 1784. Otto Jahn writes: 'A second symphony was written by Mozart in great haste on his journey through Linz in November, 1783; it was apparently that in C major (part 6, 425 K.), which, with another short symphony in G major (part 6, 444 K), bears traces of Haydn's influence, direct and indirect. Several years lie between these symphonies and the next in D major (part 1, 504 K.).' The identity of the works seem to be pretty well proved. Koechel writes: 'According to H. F. Niemeczek, it was dedicated by Mozart to a Count von Thun; this may be looked upon as decisive that this symphony is the one composed in Linz, as Mozart was very kindly taken up by Count Thun, and the dedication of his symphony, written in Thun's house, is accordingly natural.' This dedication, however, has to be taken on Niemeczek's authority, for the autograph score has been lost. Koechel gives the place and date of its composition as November 3, 1783, in Linz. It is generally numbered among the 'Vienna symphonies.'"

Little need be said of the Schumann composition, parts of which show the sad ravages of time. The Romanze and the Scherzo were charmingly delivered. Schumann is after all a charming genre painter and not a symphonist, but no orchestra, no conductor can make the last movement interesting, with its choppy phrasing and its "made in Germany" flavor. Those fault finders of the scoring of the late Johannes Brahms are recommended a liberal dose of Schumann's muddy and uninspiring efforts at instrumentation. Charm, as we remarked above, is in this music, but as a symphony it cannot stand against any one of the four signed by Brahms.

Ernst Von Dohnányi, whose remarkable playing was critically discussed in these columns last week, made an overwhelmingly successful début. He was given a welcome at the end of his classically beautiful performance of Beethoven's classically romantic Concerto that left no doubt as to the temper of his metropolitan reception. We are sick unto death of the Woolly Horse in piano playing, and noted with gratification the absence of personal display, the unfeigned modesty and devotion of Von Dohnányi to his task. He is a most artistic pianist, and one in the direct descent of Rubinstein and d'Albert. His technics are not obtruded, though one could not help recognizing the practiced hand of the master in every detail; in the smooth, powerful trills, the even scales, the singing touch, the powerful musical tone and, above all else, in the lovely phrasing.

Here is a musician first and a virtuoso afterward. There was no tossing of hair and hands, and an abiding sense of musical depth and power was even present. Mr. Von Dohnányi's cadenzas were quite in the picture, the first being, as it should be, more musical. In the second there were glimpses of the big virtuoso manner, and we are sure that when he chooses this youth can play Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt and Brahms with all the passional breadth that may be needed. But in the most poetic of Beethoven's concertos—one is tempted to write the most idyllic ever penned—the Hungarian pianist played in the right mood-key throughout. He was recalled many times, but did not play again. We are curious to hear him in recital.

The Strauss Symphonic poem becomes greater and more wonderful at every hearing. It is rich in exquisite details and Mr. Gericke did not fail to bring them all out. Such virtuosity has never been heard before in this city. The fugue—surely a parody on the fugal form as is Berlioz in his "Dies Irae!"—was clearly realized, and while the insane muddle toward the close did not sound any the less ugly, its logic was more apparent. Development is a passion with this composer, and the working out sections are miracles of polyphony, of harmonic experimentings and exotic coloring. Nothing like "Also Sprach Zarathustra" ever came from the hand of man. The Weber overture caused a violent wrench to one's musical imagination. Far better would it have been if Mr. Gericke had sent us home on the ragged edge of that extraordinary Strauss tonality.

List of Works Performed at These Matinees During the Season of 1899-1900.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 7, Overture to Goethe's Egmont.
Bellini—Casta Diva, from Norma, Madame Sembrich.
Berlioz—Three movements from the Romeo and Juliet Symphony.
Brahms—Three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6. (Scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow.)
Cherubini—Overture to Anacreon.
Dvorák—Concerto for violoncello, Alwin Schroeder. (First time at these concerts.)
Goldmark—Overture to the Prometheus Bound.
Goldmark, Rubin—Overture to Hiawatha. (MS. First time.)
Lalo—Symphonie Espagnole, for violin and orchestra, T. Adamowski.
Liszt—Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1.
Mozart—Aria, L'amero, saro Costante, from Il Re Pastore, Madame Sembrich (violin obligato by Franz Kneisel).
Rimsky-Korsakoff—Symphonic Suite, Scheherazade.
Saint-Saëns—Concerto for piano, No. 4, Mark Hambourg.
Schubert—Unfinished Symphony.
Schumann—Symphony No. 1.
Schütt—Concerto for piano, No. 2, Ludwig Breitner.
Smetana—Overture, The Bartered Bride.
Tschaikowsky—Hamlet, Fantasie-Overture, Capriccio Italien.

List of Works Performed at These Concerts During the Season of 1899-1900.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2, Symphony No. 8, Concerto for Piano, No. 4, Ernest von Dohnányi.
Berlioz—Overture to King Lear.
Brahms—Tragic Overture.
Franck, César—Symphony in D minor, Les Eolides. (First time.)
Glazounoff—Symphony No. 6. (First time.)
Humperdinck—Moorish Rhapsody. (First time.)
Loeffler, Charles Martin—Nights in the Ukrain, concert piece for violin and orchestra, Franz Kneisel. (First time.)
Mendelssohn—Overture to the Legend of The Fair Melusina, concerto for violin, Miss Leonora Jackson.
Moszkowski—Two movements from Suite No. 1.
Mozart—Symphony in C major (Koechel, No. 425) (B. & H., No. 6), Aria, Wohl denn! from Titus, Madame Olitzka. (Clarinet obligato by Mr. Selmer.)
Rubinstein—Concerto for piano, No. 4, Mark Hambourg.
Saint-Saëns—Aria, Mon Cœur s'ouvre à ta Voix, Madame Olitzka.
Strauss, Richard—Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, Symphonic poem, Thus Spake Zarathustra.
Wagner, Siegfried—Overture, Der Bärenhäuter. (First time.)
Weber—Overture to Oberon.

Savage and the Music Hall.

In a recent interview H. W. Savage said: As the agent for the present owners of the Music Hall property, I wish to correct the unauthorized and contradictory series of statements appearing in this morning's issue of the Boston Post.

This purchase of the old Music Hall was made February 8, 1899, over a year ago, by a syndicate which I represent and of which R. H. Allen is simply one member, and was a real estate transaction pure and simple. The property is in the market and can be purchased to-day.

Mr. Allen has never had a plan of securing a license for himself or of running a vaudeville entertainment in conjunction with the sale of drinks. He has not been in New York consulting with me on this matter, but has been in Havana, is still South, and I have not seen him for a month.

In connection with my real estate business, I have had plans drawn which simply contemplate modernizing the interior of the hall and adding to the comfort and convenience of its patrons.

I am not retained to handle any vaudeville enterprise, nor is that my line of work. Since the termination of my connection with the Castle Square Theatre I have had no intention of establishing a permanent opera company in Boston.

THE HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1900.

Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Lalo's Spanish violin symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" fantasy overture and Beethoven's seventh symphony had a hearing at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The orchestra was not up to its usual mark, possibly the prevalence of the grip had much to do with this, but in the Beethoven Symphony, and especially in the "Hamlet" overture, there was a distinct deficiency in the nuance and in the usual high excellence of interpretation expected from those players. Mr. Adamowski played Lalo's graceful composition in very fine fashion, and the Smetana overture was brilliantly given, but the tempi of the Beethoven Symphony were exaggerated and the general interpretation was academic, dry and pedantic. Justice was not at all done to the "Hamlet" overture, and Tschaikowsky's beautiful music sounded lifeless and dull. All the romance in it was elided, and even its most poignant beauties were obscured and slurred.

The evening concert brought forth a new pianist of whom great things were trumpeted, and this time not in vain—Mr. Ernest Von Dohnanyi, who played Beethoven's G Major concerto. Dohnanyi is a pupil of d'Albert, and plays after the manner of Busoni or Von Buelow. He is an extreme classicist and his intepretation of Beethoven's concerto was wonderfully lovely and perfect in detail, and altogether free from that sentimentalism too many great players of to-day introduce into their Beethoven playing. Dohnanyi is as great in Beethoven as Paderewski is in Chopin, and students and those who are earnest music lovers should lose no opportunity of hearing this new artist. Dohnanyi's phrasing is exquisite; his technique marvellous, and that sublimity, the chief characteristic in the music of Beethoven, so often mis-presented as sentimentality by the great pianists of our time, is beautifully grasped and understood by this pianist. Dohnanyi has not that rich, velvety touch that was Rubinstein's, but he has the earnestness, the high artistic conscientiousness that was Rubinstein's. In Dohnanyi we have a pianist who can give us Beethoven—Beethoven, the prophet, the seer, the greatest of musical gods, the Beethoven Von Bulow understood and Rubinstein interpreted.

At this concert the orchestra gave Schumann's D minor symphony, Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Weber's Oberon Overture, a truly representative programme. In the Schumann symphony there might have been more of that transcendental romanticism associated with this composer's music and so integral a part of its beauty, but the technical work was perfect. Strauss' magnificent composition received complete justice. The more one hears this work the more one likes it and discovers new beauties, and the less one feels the chaos of many passages, and much that was ugliness becomes transformed into beauty. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a tone poem to be grappled with and lived up to. As to the Weber overture, Gericke and his men rattled through it as a duty, and performed their duty badly. But it is a long jump from Hegel to Hans Christian Andersen.

The Philharmonic concert opened with Mendelssohn's ever fresh and charming "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, which could have been played better, but was still fairly well given. There is something radically wrong with the first violins in this orchestra, and Mr. Paur is not to blame for short-comings apparently beyond his power of correction. Miss Marie Brema sang an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus" and four songs, making great show of temperamental emotion and Leo Schulz played Schumann's violoncello concerto, a not particularly interesting composition, but, inasmuch as it is seldom performed, concert goers must be grateful to the artist for giving them an opportunity of hearing it. Mr. Schulz played brilliantly, with fine technique, phrasing and much finesse in interpretation. Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony was wrongly placed on the programme. It should have been given first, for deeply emotional music of this sort is best heard when the mind is freshest, and after two soloists, one of whom contributed far more than was necessary to the programme, the audience must have been too tired to grasp many of the nicer and more subtle beauties of Rubinstein's composition. However, it was well played, though on another occasion it is to be hoped Mr. Paur will give us a better opportunity to enjoy this soulful and rhapsodic symphony.

ALEXANDER MCARTHUR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. [illegible]

The Symphony Concert—Marie Brema Welcomed.

The concert opened with Schubert's overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," a work which shows Schubert clinging rather timidly to the set overture form and avoiding development of figures as much as possible. Schubert's charm in this, as in most of his instrumental works, is in the contrasting of pretty melodies, songs in disguise. It seems almost incredible that Dvorak should have written (in a recent magazine article) that Schubert's chief claim to glory lay in his instrumental works; Schubert thought song, as Beethoven thought orchestra, and Schumann thought piano, whatever the composition in hand might have been. His lack of contrapuntal knowledge prevented Schubert from becoming very great in the classical instrumental forms, and the last act in his art-life was to arrange for contrapuntal lessons from Sechter, in order to remedy this defect. He died about ten days after arranging for these lessons.

Mme. Marie Brema was welcomed cordially upon her appearance but it is doubtful if she attained the height that the audience anticipated. Her first number was a peculiar ballad, with orchestra, by St. Saens,—"La Fiancee du Timbalier." The interpretation of this was often stagy and exaggerated. Possibly the artist felt the monotony of the first dozen verses and tried to force dramatic effect into them. As a matter of fact it is only when the procession marches by and the poor maiden seeks in vain for her drummer (not unlike Burger's "Lenore," this) that a degree of intensity is attained. For a ballad intended as a vocal solo more definite and continuous action is required, as witness the poems which the great ballad composer, Carl Loewe, selected,—"Erl-king," "Sir Oluf," "Archibald Douglas," ed id genus omne!

The climax, however, is here undeniably effective, even if not novel, but it comes too late to save the work. Madame Brema gave a species of vocal recitation, intermingled with much tremolo and many faults of intonation. She did better in her subsequent numbers, Wagner's "Schmerzen" and "Traeume," but we still prefer to hear her in her legitimate domain, the German opera, for upon the concert platform a degree of vocal excellence is demanded and intense emotion does not have quite the effect that it achieves when combined with stage accessories. The singer was twice recalled after each appearance, and has no reason to complain of her welcome at the hands of our public.

The first "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, does not seem to wear threadbare in the slightest degree. The little game of tag which the gnomes play in their mountain abode excites the audience as much as it ever did. It was superbly played on this occasion, with an ensemble that was memorable, and had Mr. Gericke been less firm in his refusal, it would have received an encore. We are glad to note that even if our conductor allows the rule against encores at these concerts to be broken by a few favorite soloists, he does not propose to break it himself.

The concert ended with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which we consider far and away the best of this composer's orchestral works. But the work has faded a little; its defects show forth more plainly than they used to do. When the composition was written, those deep passages for the clarinette, which picture darkness and foreboding, in the early part of the symphony, were novel; only Weber and Mendelssohn had then understood the spectral tone-color which was in the youngest instrument of the orchestra; but at present these effects have been so much used that they have become conventional. The clear sonata form of the first movement is commendable (with subordinate and closing themes in the dominant minor, in the old-fashioned way), but the storm which arises in the code scarcely holds its own against the more modern tempests of the musical repertoire.

The gem of the work is, of course, the Scherzo, with its delightful theme on the clarinette. In the last movement also the clarinette has beautiful work to do, and all these important passages were well-played at this performance. The theme of the Scherzo is the most truly Scottish melody that ever was written by a German composer. It is curious to note how almost all the great composers of Germany have come under the spell of the Scottish folk-song, and none of them have been able to reproduce it. Beethoven un-Scotched several Gaelic songs for Thompson, of Edinburg; Schumann Teutonized several of Burns' poems; Franz wrote magnificent German music to "Nun hol't mir eine Canne Wein"; and Max Bruch made most furious onslaughts upon "The Campbells are comin'", as well as upon several other Scottish tunes; but all without catching the true lilt and swing of Scottish minstrelsy; Mendelssohn alone has here given a melody which would satisfy a Scot.

But the languishing Adagio no longer causes the slightest thrill. Here we have the point-lace Mendelssohn of the "Songs without Words," a sentimentality which suggests nothing higher than the "Books of Beauty," which were in vogue in the early part of the century. It comes dangerously near the border-line of mawkishness.

The finale makes some amends; the bold rhythmic treatment of the chief theme is not unlike Beethoven's work in the first movement of his seventh symphony, and that bit of clarinette (above alluded to), just before the coda, suggests the loneliness of the Trossachs about as well as any music can do. We found this movement rather prosaically read; it was all martial instead of presenting strong contrasts, and the final hymn of thanksgiving was not worked up as it might have been. In this movement one finds the weakest Mendelssohn as well as the strongest, for the little organ-point of brasses at the end of the coda suggests Dockstader's negro minstrels rather than the climax of a symphony.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII, NO. 91.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Marie Brema Appears as the Soloist.

She is Heard to the Best Advantage in the Wagner Songs—The Dainty Grieg Suite Is Charmingly Interpreted by Mr. Gerick, and Delightfully Played.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season took place in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Overture to "Alphonso and Estella"...Schubert
"La Fiancee du Timbalier"........Saint-Saens
Suite No. 1, from "Peer Gynt"..........Grieg
"Schmerzen" and "Fraume"..........Wagner
(Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
"Scotch" symphony..................Mendelssohn

Mme. Marie Brema was the soloist.

The bright and well balanced programme, as will be seen, was made up of music wholly familiar to Symphony concert audiences, the only exception being Saint-Saens' effective setting of Victor Hugo's fine poem. The dainty Grieg suite was charmingly interpreted by Mr. Gericke, and beautifully played. The coloring throughout was exquisite, and the applause bestowed on the performance was the heartiest of the evening. In fact, the audience clamored for a repetition of the last movement, but Mr. Gericke was, it is pleasing to record, rigidly inflexible in maintaining his rule against encores, and the pity of it is that his wise course is not imitated at other concerts, and a steadily growing evil put an end to. A delightfully sympathetic reading of the Mendelssohn symphony was given. Rarely, indeed, is so smooth, brilliant and admirably accented rendering of the scherzo heard as was accorded it on this occasion.

The Saint-Saens ballad is in the composer's most thoughtful vein, and echoes the spirit of the poem in all its changing moods with striking fidelity. There is a splendid outburst at the return of the soldiers, and the lapse from joy, as the girl anticipates clasping her drummer lover to her heart, to her despair as the regiment goes on its way and the drummers pass, and her lover is not among them, is searching in its keen dramatic pathos. The orchestration of the work is among the triumphs of the composer in an art in which he excels.

Mme. Brema again brought the exaggerated expression of the opera stage into the concert room in her singing, and in her search for intensity of sentiment both oversang and overacted. This high pressure style is not favorable to the production of that large simplicity which is an essential in good art. Where everything is emphasized to the fullest extent possible, climaxes are anticipated, and when they are reached they fall flat.

The singer's reading was extravagant throughout; there was neither sincerity nor artistic reserve power in it. The stage-stagey dominated the effort from beginning to end. Then, too, tones were exploded unmeaningly, and not always with purity of intonation, and what is most desirable in vocal method was too often absent. It seemed as if the style in which Mme. Brema interpreted the ballad was not quite suited to the atmosphere of a Symphony concert. But, however that may be, she was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

In the Wagner songs, by the way, admirably scored by Herr Mottl, she was heard to better advantage, though even here the sentiment verged somewhat on "gushiness," and there was, now and then, aberration in pitch; but, on the whole, the artist made a better impression in them than she did in her earlier effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sapho," Goldmark; concerto for pianoforte, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, first time; ballet suite, by Rameau-Mottl, and symphony No. 1, Borodin. Mrs. Beach is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY. APRIL 1, 1900.

Marie Brema in Saint-Saëns's Ballad at the Symphony Concert

The program of the 20th concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall last night, was as follows:

Overture to "Alphonso and Estrella"..
Schubert
"La Fiancée du Timbalier," Ballad with Orchestra..............Saint-Saëns
Suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt" ....Grieg
Songs with Orchestra...................Wagner
(The Accompaniment scored for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(a) "Schmerzen."
(b) "Traeume."
Symphony in A minor.........Mendelssohn

This concert provoked amiability and the gentleman-like joy that according to Athenaeus is one of the chief objects of music. The overture by Schubert is interesting solely from the standpoint of the antiquarian. There is little of the genius of Schubert in it, and the second theme of the allegro is, as Mr. Apthorp says in the program book, "exceedingly simple"—that is, if by "simple" he means "foolish." The suite by Grieg was delightfully played, and the Scherzo of the symphony gave much pleasure. The first movement of the same symphony is skillfully made and all that, but it reminds one of an apparently endless and genteel Songs Without Words that is finally overtaken by a smart shower. No wonder that Mendelssohn dedicated the work to Queen Victoria. It probably at last excited her to write her celebrated Journal.

Marie Brema sang, or rather recited dramatically, Saint-Saëns's "Fiancée du Timbalier," which was composed in 1887 and first sung at a Lamoureux concert, Feb. 19, 1888, by Mrs. Montalba. I say she recited rather than sang it, for I do not wish to dwell on faulty intonation and faulty tone-production. She recited with considerable facial expression and pectoral emotion, and she was often effective. The songs of Wagner were better suited to her voice and Bayreuth delivery, and by them, also, she won applause.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED [illegible]5. MARCH 31, 1900.

Mr. Gerick understands thoroughly the advantage there is in putting an audience into a cheerful, light mood to begin with, and his first number is generally of such sort that the listener is at once possessed by a desire to hear something more and prepared to bestow a more serious attention, should that be required. Accordingly, he headed his twentieth programme with the gay, neat, entertaining, melodious and buoyant "Alfonso and Estrella" overture of Schubert, first heard in Boston, we think, at a Harvard concert, years and years ago. At the extreme end of the programme he set Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, as welcome as familiar, and played like the overture with an exquisite finish adorning the acube and delicately appreciative perception of its every fancy and detail of expression and color. Scarcely less of an acquaintance was the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg, which held the middle place in the series of selections and was greatly enjoyed, since each of its poetic and yet dramatic numbers had just the apt motion and received the true tone-coloring.

Mme. Marie Brema just (we wish we could honestly say fresh) from her many Wagner successes in New York appeared as the soloist, and sang in the latter part of the evening the Master's "Schmerzen" and "Traume" and earlier a setting of Victor Hugo's ballad "La Fiancee du Timbalier."

This thrilling ballad, exquisitely set to music by Saint Saens, was rendered with great dramatic power by Mme. Brema, the contrasting emotions of hope and fear, pride in the return of the victorious army, followed by the heart breaking discovery by the poor "fiancee" that her drummer-boy is missing from the gay pageant—these varied emotions, perfectly indicated in the music, were interpreted with rare expressiveness and feeling by both artist and orchestra.

Next week we are promised two novelties—the new pianoforte concerto by Mrs. Beach whose compositions are always so welcome and a ballet suite by Rameau-Moth. Mrs. Beach is to play the pianoforte.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1900.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 20th of this season's symphony concerts was given in Music hall last evening, to the enjoyment of the usual crowded audience. The soloist was Mme Marie Brema, and the program was as follows:

Overture to "Alphonso and Estrella," Op 69 ....Franz Schubert
"La Fiancee du Timbalier," ballad with orchestra, Op 82 ....Camille Saint-Saens
Suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt," Op 46 ....Edvard Hagerup Grieg
Songs with orchestra ....Richard Wagner
(The accompaniment scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(a) "Schmerzen"
(b) "Traume"
Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Op 56 ....Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy

The distinguished singer who has been heard here with much pleasure in grand opera was greeted with great cordiality and her three numbers were heartily applauded. That Mme Brema is a noble artist, that she has a voice of splendid power and delightful quality and that she sings with magnificent expression, no one will deny, and yet it cannot be said that her performance with the Symphony orchestra was wholly satisfactory. She is distinctly a dramatic singer, and her forceful and impassioned style is more agreeable in grand opera than in concert.

She sang the Saint-Saens ballad with splendid spirit and generally with fine effect, but there were a few passages in which the sentiment seemed over accented, and where there was unnecessary exaggeration in the contrasted volume of tone. In the Wagner songs Mme Brema was heard to better advantage, although greater simplicity of style would not have been unwelcome in her interpretation of "Schmerzen." The music and sentiment of the "Traume" song is very similar to that of the great love scene in the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," and the singer gave it expression with admirable effect.

The three orchestral numbers were thoroughly enjoyable, and often as they have been played here, they have never been given more finished, more expressive or more wholly gratifying interpretations than they received yesterday under Mr Gericke's direction. The variedly contrasted music of the "Peer Gynt" suite was played with captivating results, especially the dainty dance of the third movement, which was given exquisitely. The brilliant fourth movement was also played superbly.

The manifold beauties of the "Scotch" symphony have surely never been more clearly portrayed, and there was ample reason for the enthusiastic outburst of applause which rewarded the conductor at the conclusion of the performance.

Mrs H. H. A. Beach will be the soloist this week, playing for the first time her new C sharp minor concerto for pianoforte. The other numbers will be the overture from Goldmark's "Sapho," a ballet-suite by Raineau-Motti (first time) and Borodin's first symphony.

THE HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 28, 1900.

Smetana's "Bartered Bride" overture, Lalo's Spanish violin symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Hamlet" fantasy overture and Beethoven's seventh symphony had a hearing at the afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week. Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist. The orchestra was not up to its usual mark, possibly the prevalence of the grip had much to do with this, but in the Beethoven Symphony, and especially in the "Hamlet" overture, there was a distinct deficiency in the nuance and in the usual high excellence of interpretation expected from those players. Mr. Adamowski played Lalo's graceful composition in very fine fashion, and the Smetana overture was brilliantly given, but the tempi of the Beethoven Symphony were exaggerated and the general interpretation was academic, dry and pedantic. Justice was not at all done to the "Hamlet" overture, and Tschaikowsky's beautiful music sounded lifeless and dull. All the romance in it was elided, and even its most poignant beauties were obscured and slurred.

The evening concert brought forth a new pianist of whom great things were trumpeted, and this time not in vain—Mr. Ernest Von Dohnanyi, who played Beethoven's G Major concerto. Dohnanyi is a pupil of d'Albert, and plays after the manner of Busoni or Von Buelow. He is an extreme classicist and his intepretation of Beethoven's concerto was wonderfully lovely and perfect in detail, and altogether free from that sentimentalism too many great players of to-day introduce into their Beethoven playing. Dohnanyi is as great in Beethoven as Paderewski is in Chopin, and students and those who are earnest music lovers should lose no opportunity of hearing this new artist. Dohnanyi's phrasing is exquisite; his technique marvellous, and that sublimity, the chief characteristic in the music of Beethoven, so often mis-presented as sentimentality by the great pianists of our time, is beautifully grasped and understood by this pianist. Dohnanyi has not that rich, velvety touch that was Rubinstein's, but he has the earnestness, the high artistic conscientiousness that was Rubinstein's. In Dohnanyi we have a pianist who can give us Beethoven—Beethoven, the prophet, the seer, the greatest of musical gods, the Beethoven Von Bulow understood and Rubinstein interpreted.

At this concert the orchestra gave Schumann's D minor symphony, Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Weber's Oberon Overture, a truly representative programme. In the Schumann symphony there might have been more of that transcendental romanticism associated with this composer's music and so integral a part of its beauty, but the technical work was perfect. Strauss' magnificent composition received complete justice. The more one hears this work the more one likes it and discovers new beauties, and the less one feels the chaos of many passages, and much that was ugliness becomes transformed into beauty. "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is a tone poem to be grappled with and lived up to. As to the Weber overture, Gericke and his men rattled through it as a duty, and performed their duty badly. But it is a long jump from Hegel to Hans Christian Andersen.

The Philharmonic concert opened with Mendelssohn's ever fresh and charming "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, which could have been played better, but was still fairly well given. There is something radically wrong with the first violins in this orchestra, and Mr. Paur is not to blame for short-comings apparently beyond his power of correction. Miss Marie Brema sang an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus" and four songs, making great show of temperamental emotion and Leo Schulz played Schumann's violoncello concerto, a not particularly interesting composition, but, inasmuch as it is seldom performed, concert goers must be grateful to the artist for giving them an opportunity of hearing it. Mr. Schulz played brilliantly, with fine technique, phrasing and much finesse in interpretation. Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony was wrongly placed on the programme. It should have been given first, for deeply emotional music of this sort is best heard when the mind is freshest, and after two soloists, one of whom contributed far more than was necessary to the programme, the audience must have been too tired to grasp many of the nicer and more subtle beauties of Rubinstein's composition. However, it was well played, though on another occasion it is to be hoped Mr. Paur will give us a better opportunity to enjoy this soulful and rhapsodic symphony.

ALEXANDER MCARTHUR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APR. 2, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Marie Brema Welcomed.

The concert opened with Schubert's overture to "Alfonso and Estrella," a work which shows Schubert clinging rather timidly to the set overture form and avoiding development of figures as much as possible. Schubert's charm in this, as in most of his instrumental works, is in the contrasting of pretty melodies, songs in disguise. It seems almost incredible that Dvorak should have written (in a recent magazine article) that Schubert's chief claim to glory lay in his instrumental works; Schubert thought song, as Beethoven thought orchestra, and Schumann thought piano, whatever the composition in hand might have been. His lack of contrapuntal knowledge prevented Schubert from becoming very great in the classical instrumental forms, and the last act in his art-life was to arrange for contrapuntal lessons from Sechter, in order to remedy this defect. He died about ten days after arranging for these lessons.

Mme. Marie Brema was welcomed cordially upon her appearance but it is doubtful if she attained the height that the audience anticipated. Her first number was a peculiar ballad, with orchestra, by St. Saens,—"La Fiancee du Timbalier." The interpretation of this was often stagy and exaggerated. Possibly the artist felt the monotony of the first dozen verses and tried to force dramatic effect into them. As a matter of fact it is only when the procession marches by and the poor maiden seeks in vain for her drummer (not unlike Burger's "Lenore," this) that a degree of intensity is attained. For a ballad intended as a vocal solo more definite and continuous action is required, as witness the poems which the great ballad composer, Carl Loewe, selected,—"Erl-king," "Sir Oluf," "Archibald Douglas," ed id genus omne!

The climax, however, is here undeniably effective, even if not novel, but it comes too late to save the work. Madame Brema gave a species of vocal recitation, intermingled with much tremolo and many faults of intonation. She did better in her subsequent numbers, Wagner's "Schmerzen" and "Traeume," but we still prefer to hear her in her legitimate domain, the German opera, for upon the concert platform a degree of vocal excellence is demanded and intense emotion does not have quite the effect that it achieves when combined with stage accessories. The singer was twice recalled after each appearance, and has no reason to complain of her welcome at the hands of our public.

The first "Peer Gynt" suite, by Grieg, does not seem to wear threadbare in the slightest degree. The little game of tag which the gnomes play in their mountain abode excites the audience as much as it ever did. It was superbly played on this occasion, with an ensemble that was memorable, and had Mr. Gericke been less firm in his refusal, it would have received an encore. We are glad to note that even if our conductor allows the rule against encores at these concerts to be broken by a few favorite soloists, he does not propose to break it himself.

The concert ended with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, which we consider far and away the best of this composer's orchestral works. But the work has faded a little; its defects show forth more plainly than they used to do. When the composition was written, those deep passages for the clarinette, which picture darkness and foreboding, in the early part of the symphony, were novel; only Weber and Mendelssohn had then understood the spectral tone-color which was in the youngest instrument of the orchestra; but at present these effects have been so much used that they have become conventional. The clear sonata form of the first movement is commendable (with subordinate and closing themes in the dominant minor, in the old-fashioned way), but the storm which arises in the code scarcely holds its own against the more modern tempests of the musical repertoire.

The gem of the work is, of course, the Scherzo, with its delightful theme on the clarinette. In the last movement also the clarinette has beautiful work to do, and all these important passages were well-played at this performance. The theme of the Scherzo is the most truly Scottish melody that ever was written by a German composer. It is curious to note how almost all the great composers of Germany have come under the spell of the Scottish folksong, and none of them have been able to reproduce it. Beethoven un-Scotched several Gaelic songs for Thompson, of Edinburg; Schumann Teutonized several of Burns' poems; Franz wrote magnificent German music to "Nun hol't mir eine Canne Wein"; and Max Bruch made most furious onslaughts upon "The Campbells are comin' ", as well as upon several other Scottish tunes; but all without catching the true lilt and swing of Scottish minstrelsy; Mendelssohn alone has here given a melody which would satisfy a Scot.

But the languishing Adagio no longer causes the slightest thrill. Here we have the point-lace Mendelssohn of the "Songs without Words," a sentimentality which suggests nothing higher than the "Books of Beauty," which were in vogue in the early part of the century. It comes dangerously near the border-line of mawkishness.

The finale makes some amends; the bold rhythmic treatment of the chief theme is not unlike Beethoven's work in the first movement of his seventh symphony, and that bit of clarinette (above alluded to), just before the coda, suggests the loneliness of the Trossachs about as well as any music can do. We found this movement rather prosaically read; it was all martial instead of presenting strong contrasts, and the final hymn of thanksgiving was not worked up as it might have been. In this movement one finds the weakest Mendelssohn as well as the strongest, for the little organ-point of brasses at the end of the coda suggests Dockstader's negro minstrels rather than the climax of a symphony.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII, NO. 91.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Marie Brema Appears as the Soloist.

She is Heard to the Best Advantage in the Wagner Songs—The Dainty Grieg Suite Is Charmingly Interpreted by Mr. Gerick, and Delightfully Played.

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's season took place in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Overture to "Alphonso and Estella"	Schubert
"La Fiancee du Limbslier"	Saint-Saens
Suite No. 1, from "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
"Schmerzen" and "Fraume" (Scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.)	Wagner
"Scotch" symphony	Mendelssohn

Mme. Marie Brema was the soloist.

The bright and well balanced programme, as will be seen, was made up of music wholly familiar to Symphony concert audiences, the only exception being Saint-Saens' effective setting of Victor Hugo's fine poem. The dainty Grieg suite was charmingly interpreted by Mr. Gericke, and beautifully played. The coloring throughout was exquisite, and the applause bestowed on the performance was the heartiest of the evening. In fact, the audience clamored for a repetition of the last movement, but Mr. Gericke was, it is pleasing to record, rigidly inflexible in maintaining his rule against encores, and the pity of it is that his wise course is not imitated at other concerts, and a steadily growing evil put an end to. A delightfully sympathetic reading of the Mendelssohn symphony was given. Rarely, indeed, is so smooth, brilliant and admirably accented rendering of the scherzo heard as was accorded it on this occasion.

The Saint-Saens ballad is in the composer's most thoughtful vein, and echoes the spirit of the poem in all its changing moods with striking fidelity. There is a splendid outburst at the return of the soldiers, and the lapse from joy, as the girl anticipates clasping her drummer lover to her heart, to her despair as the regiment goes on its way and the drummers pass, and her lover is not among them, is searching in its keen dramatic pathos. The orchestration of the work is among the triumphs of the composer in an art in which he excels.

Mme. Brema again brought the exaggerated expression of the opera stage into the concert room in her singing, and in her search for intensity of sentiment both oversang and overacted. This high pressure style is not favorable to the production of that large simplicity which is an essential in good art. Where everything is emphasized to the fullest extent possible, climaxes are anticipated, and when they are reached they fall flat.

The singer's reading was extravagant throughout; there was neither sincerity nor artistic reserve power in it. The stage-stagey dominated the effort from beginning to end. Then, too, tones we e exploded unmeaningly, and not always with purity of intonation, and what is most desirable in vocal method was too often absent. It seemed as if the style in which Mme. Brema interpreted the ballad was not quite suited to the atmosphere of a Symphony concert. But, however that may be, she was warmly applauded and twice recalled.

In the Wagner songs, by the way, admirably scored by Herr Mottl, she was heard to better advantage, though even here the sentiment verged somewhat on "gushiness," and there was, now and then, aberration in pitch; but, on the whole, the artist made a better impression in them than she did in her earlier effort.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Sapho," Goldmark; concerto for pianoforte, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, first time; ballet suite, by Rameau-Mottl, and symphony No. 1, Borodin. Mrs. Beach is to be the soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1900.

Marie Brema in Saint-Saëns's Ballad at the Symphony Concert—

The program of the 20th concert of the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall last night, was as follows:

Overture to "Alphonso and Estrella"..	Schubert
"La Fiancée du Timbalier," Ballad with Orchestra	Saint-Saëns
Suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt"	Grieg
Songs with Orchestra (The Accompaniment scored for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.) (a) "Schmerzen." (b) "Traeume."	Wagner
Symphony in A minor	Mendelssohn

This concert provoked amiability and the gentleman-like joy that according to Athenaeus is one of the chief objects of music. The overture by Schubert is interesting solely from the standpoint of the antiquarian. There is little of the genius of Schubert in it, and the second theme of the allegro is, as Mr. Apthorp says in the program book, "exceedingly simple"—that is, if by "simple" he means "foolish." The suite by Grieg was delightfully played, and the Scherzo of the symphony gave much pleasure. The first movement of the same symphony is skillfully made and all that, but it reminds one of an apparently endless and genteel Songs Without Words that is finally overtaken by a smart shower. No wonder that Mendelssohn dedicated the work to Queen Victoria. It probably at last excited her to write her celebrated Journal.

Marie Brema sang, or rather recited dramatically, Saint-Saëns's "Fiancée du Timbalier," which was composed in 1887 and first sung at a Lamoureux concert, Feb. 19, 1888, by Mrs. Montalba. I say she recited rather than sang it, for I do not wish to dwell on faulty intonation and faulty tone-production. She recited with considerable facial expression and pectoral emotion, and she was often effective. The songs of Wagner were better suited to her voice and Bayreuth delivery, and by them, also, she won applause.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1825. MARCH 31, 1900.

Mr. Gerick understands thoroughly the advantage there is in putting an audience into a cheerful, light mood to begin with, and his first number is generally of such sort that the listener is at once possessed by a desire to hear something more and prepared to bestow a more serious attention, should that be required. Accordingly, he headed his twentieth programme with the gay, neat, entertaining, melodious and buoyant "Alfonso and Estrella" overture of Schubert, first heard in Boston, we think, at a Harvard concert, years and years ago. At the extreme end of the programme he set Mendelssohn's "Scotch" symphony, as welcome as familiar, and played like the overture with an exquisite finish adorning the acube and delicately appreciative perception of its every fancy and detail of expression and color. Scarcely less of an acquaintance was the "Peer Gynt" suite of Grieg, which held the middle place in the series of selections and was greatly enjoyed, since each of its poetic and yet dramatic numbers had just the apt motion and received the true tone-coloring.

Mme. Marie Brema just (we wish we could honestly say fresh) from her many Wagner successes in New York appeared as the soloist, and sang in the latter part of the evening the Master's "Schmerzen" and "Traume" and earlier a setting of Victor Hugo's ballad "La Fiancee du Timbalier."

This thrilling ballad, exquisitely set to music by Saint Saens, was rendered with great dramatic power by Mme. Brema, the contrasting emotions of hope and fear, pride in the return of the victorious army, followed by the heart breaking discovery by the poor "fiancee" that her drummer-boy is missing from the gay pageant—these varied emotions, perfectly indicated in the music, were interpreted with rare expressiveness and feeling by both artist and orchestra.

Next week we are promised two novelties—the new pianoforte concerto by Mrs. Beach whose compositions are always so welcome and a ballet suite by Rameau Moth. Mrs. Beach is to play the pianotorte.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1, 1900.

TWENTIETH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 20th of this season's symphony concerts was given in Music hall last evening, to the enjoyment of the usual crowded audience. The soloist was Mme Marie Brema, and the program was as follows:

Overture to "Alphonso and Estrella," Op 69	Franz Schubert
"La Fiancee du Timbalier," ballad with orchestra, Op 82	Camille Saint-Saens
Suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt," Op 46	Edvard Hagerup Grieg
Songs with orchestra (The accompaniment scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl.) (a) "Schmerzen" (b) "Traume"	Richard Wagner
Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Op 56	Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy

The distinguished singer who has been heard here with much pleasure in grand opera was greeted with great cordiality and her three numbers were heartily applauded. That Mme Brema is a noble artist, that she has a voice of splendid power and delightful quality and that she sings with magnificent expression, no one will deny, and yet it cannot be said that her performance with the Symphony orchestra was wholly satisfactory. She is distinctly a dramatic singer, and her forceful and impassioned style is more agreeable in grand opera than in concert.

She sang the Saint-Saens ballad with splendid spirit and generally with fine effect, but there were a few passages in which the sentiment seemed over accented, and where there was unnecessary exaggeration in the contrasted volume of tone. In the Wagner songs Mme Brema was heard to better advantage, although greater simplicity of style would not have been unwelcome in her interpretation of "Schmerzen." The music and sentiment of the "Traume" song is very similar to that of the great love scene in the second act of "Tristan and Isolde," and the singer gave it expression with admirable effect.

The three orchestral numbers were thoroughly enjoyable, and often as they have been played here, they have never been given more finished, more expressive or more wholly gratifying interpretations than they received yesterday under Mr Gericke's direction. The variedly contrasted music of the "Peer Gynt" suite was played with captivating results, especially the dainty dance of the third movement, which was given exquisitely. The brilliant fourth movement was also played superbly.

The manifold beauties of the "Scotch" symphony have surely never been more clearly portrayed, and there was ample reason for the enthusiastic outburst of applause which rewarded the conductor at the conclusion of the performance.

Mrs H. H. A. Beach will be the soloist this week, playing for the first time her new C sharp minor concerto for pianoforte. The other numbers will be the overture from Goldmark's "Sapho," a ballet-suite by Raineau-Motti (first time) and Borodin's first symphony.

DOHNÁNYI.

NEW YORK PRESS NOTICES.

(From New York " Tribune," March 23, 1900.)

A New Piano Player.

THE most interesting of Mr. Gericke's offerings at the last of this season's concerts in the Borough of Manhattan by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Beethoven's G-major pianoforte concerto, with the solo part played by Ernst von Dohnányi, in whom, since he sprang into public notice two years ago or thereabouts, the musical public have felt a very proper interest—very proper because the incidents which created it were not of the ordinary sensational or meretricious kind. Mr., or Herr, or Monsieur, or Pan, Dohnányi won a prize in composition which had drawn the eyes of the musicians and had astonished and delighted London, but he did not, because of that circumstance, immediately start out with a flourish of trumpets upon a conquest of the world. Had Mr. Gericke, who was one of the adjudicators in the Bösendörfer composition, in which he was victorious, not been so anxious for his co-operation in a series of the Boston Orchestra concerts as to prevail upon him to come to America for that series alone, we should not have heard him. He came, therefore, under unusual conditions, and he has fulfilled a lovely mission. His achievement last night was brightly illuminative not of pianoforte virtuosoship, as that term is popularly understood, but of sweet, healthy musicianship. He played the concerto from the beginning like a musician who knew it because he loved it, because he knew it down to its inmost heart-beats. He made no display of pianistic feats, and since he did not try to do anything in that direction it is not to be said what his capacity as a specialist may be. It is doubtful if he could bewilder were he to try, for there are elements in pianoforte playing which have been exploited here over and over again this season which are not at his command, if we are to judge by the evidence afforded last night. So much of charm as lies in pure sensuousness of tone is only moderately represented in his playing. There were times when a more fluent legato would have been agreeable, and the instrument which he plays has a lovelier tone than that which he produced, but his reading was permeated by a spirit of poetry which was all the more heart warming because it was so utterly free from the slack of sentimentality, or weakness of any kind. All was sane and sound, the utterance of a man who felt, as Beethoven said, that it was the purpose of music to strike fire from the soul of man, not to put it in the melting mood. Not the least interesting of his demonstrations of a noble birth in music was made in the two cadenzas of his own composition, which he introduced in the concerto. In the first, especially, there was a capital illustration of the correct appreciation of the duty of a virtuoso in writing a cadenza—the duty to stick in letter and spirit to the text set by the composer. The success of the young artist with the public was complete and emphatic. He was recalled over and over again to acknowledge the grateful tributes of the audience.

(From New York "Times," March 23, 1900.)

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its series at Carnegie Hall last night in the presence of an audience large in numbers and generous in applause.

The solo performer in the Beethoven concerto last night was Ernst von Dohnányi, a young pianist who has already made a name for himself on the other side of the Atlantic, and who was acclaimed with delight at his recent American début in Boston. To please both Boston and New York falls to the lot of few pianists, and Mr. Dohnányi may account himself fortunate, or exceptionally gifted, for he achieved an immediate and well-earned success here. It was evidence of his respect for his art as well as of his readiness to subject himself to the most critical examination that he elected to make himself known through the medium of a work which calls for the purest and loftiest style of piano playing, and offers no possibility of concealing musical shallowness behind a blinding display of virtuosity.

Mr. Dohnányi played the concerto beautifully. His reading of it was distinguished by a dignified continence of color, a broad and reposeful clarity, a surety of purpose, and an exquisite adaptation of all the details to the general exposition. His enunciation of the themes was manly, straightforward, and musically balanced. His building up of the climaxes of the development was full of power and brilliant in lucidity. His technic was ample, and manifestly there was an abundance of reserve force. His finger work was particularly vigorous, strong, and elastic. Indeed, throughout the first movement the crisp clearness of his musical diction evoked constant admiration. In the second he showed a fine command of tone color and the art of singing upon the piano. The last movement was filled with variety and contrast. But what was most important was the true appreciation of the Beethoven spirit. As an exposition of form and an analysis of context the interpretation recalled the performances of Dr. von Bülow at his best. It was a chaste, elevated, and refreshingly sane interpretation, yet high in conception, and both sincere and direct in presentation. Mr. Dohnányi is a young man, but he is already an artist of high rank.

(From New York " World," March 23, 1900.)

Dohnányi's Great Success.

The Classic Young Pianist Carries Audience by Storm.

ERNST von Dohnányi, the young Hungarian pianist, made his début in New York at Carnegie Hall last evening and achieved a great success. He justified all the extravagant praise that London, and recently Boston, has lavished upon him.

In these days of personal assertiveness in art such a pianist is a surprise. He is an interpreter of the classic type. Everything he does is primarily musicianly. He does reverence to the composer, subordinating himself entirely. There is no display of his skill, no perversions for the sake of exhibiting special facilities of execution. He is refined, dignified, modest. His playing is of the purest type, honest, unaffected, sane.

What he may do with the romántic composers is something which can only be ascertained when he gives a recital, as he probably will soon. But as an exponent of Beethoven's music he may be set down as one of the first among contemporary pianists. Last night he played the noble concerto in G major. He read the work with intelligence, sympathy and feeling. He did not attempt to poetize it, nor did he go to the other extreme of prosaic inflexibility. He was eloquent within purely artistic forms. It seemed as if years had elapsed since Beethoven had had such an interpreter.

His equipment is perfect—an exquisite touch, a rare command of tone color, a discreet control of force, a subtle skill in his emphases. In the two cadenzas of his own, which he introduced in the concerto, he displays brilliant imagination.

(From New York "Herald," March 23, 1900.)

Pianist's Successful Début.

ERNST von Dohnányi, the Hungarian pianist, made his début here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night.

It is not often nowadays that a Beethoven concerto arouses great enthusiasm. But this pianist's playing of that composer's Opus 58 (G major) was technically so flawless, his tone was so clear and sympathetic, and his interpretation so poetic, that the audience recalled him no less than six times. Few young pianists have been so warmly welcomed here.

(From New York " Sun," March 23, 1900.)

Boston Symphony Concert.

Ernst von Dohnányi, the Pianist, Makes His Début in New York.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its New York season last night at Carnegie Hall, and introduced a new pianist, Ernst von Dohnányi, to local audiences. The chief interest of the audience centred naturally in M. Dohnányi, who has already gained some repute abroad, although he is only 22 years old. He was heard in Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, a number which gives little opportunity for display of his technical powers. He played it with judgment, and revealed the possession of a truly classical style. His tone is not large, but equal and discreet. It has the singing quality in an unusual degree. M. Dohnányi is not sensational in any phase of his art. He made no attempt at brilliant or dazzling playing, which the concerto did not allow. While lacking the tremendous power of Eugen d'Albert, he is plainly to be recognized as one of his pupils. A cadenza made of the themes of the concerto, evidently of the pianist's own composition, showed that he possessed excellent technical equipment.

(From New York " Press," March 23, 1900.)

New Pianist Plays for Us.

Ernst Von Dohnányi Heard at Last Symphony Concert.

FITTING was the close last night to the series of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The concert served to introduce a new pianist of European reputation, Ernst von Dohnányi. He proved himself an artist of exceptional merit. His playing of Beethoven's great concerto in G major was characterized by suavity and delicacy rather than strength. The audience grew unusually demonstrative over him, and called him out many times after his number. Undoubtedly he is an artist of much promise.

(From New York " Staats-Zeitung," March 23, 1900.)

GESTERN Abend gab das Bostoner Symphonie Orchester sein letztes New Yorker Concert in dieser Saison.

Als Solist trat Herr Ernst von Dohnányi auf. Er ist noch ein Jüngling, aber doch schon ein voller Künstler. Er spielte das Beethoven'sche G-dur Concert, und zwar so schön, wie es hier nur sehr selten gespielt worden ist. Dohnányi ist einer von den Gediegenen, aber nicht von den Trockenen Technisch war er nicht nur untadelig, sondern er liess auch vermuthen, dass er die modernsten Virtuosenthaten verrichten kann, ohne mit der Wimper zu zucken. Viel schwerer wiegt aber, dass er ein praktischer Musiker ist. Den ersten Satz des Concertes spielte er geradezu gross. Dohnányi ist hochwillkommen in Amerika. Wir haben zu viel ungesunde Sentimentalität im Klavierspiel hier gehabt, wir können eine Portion Gesundheit vertragen.

(From New York " Evening Post," March 23, 1900.)

THE final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was heard last night by an audience which nearly filled Carnegie Hall and which had plenty of occasion for applause, for the concert was the most enjoyable one the Bostonians have given us in a long time.

Mr. Ernst von Dohnányi, the young Hungarian pianist who has been so much lauded in Vienna and London, made his New York début at this concert with Beethoven's G major concerto—a queer choice, for it is not a piece that enables one to estimate a pianist's powers in many directions. It is a pity that he did not play his own concerto, which won the Bösendorfer prize in Vienna. Under the circumstances the critic is compelled to defer pronouncing judgment until the young pianist has been heard in a varied recital. So much may be said, however, that he played yesterday much more like a German than a Hungarian, intellectually rather than emotionally, with academic precision and literalness rather than with the power of individual conception, which is in our days expected of a musician as much as of an actor. He did not exhaust the possibilities of tone-coloring, which even the unidiomatic writing of Beethoven for the piano permits. But in other respects, as a literal reading of the notes, his playing was most enjoyable, especially in the beautiful andante, which he phrased with superlative art and genuine devotion. He was cordially applauded.

(From New York "Mail and Express," March 23, 1900.)

THE last few weeks of a busy New York musical season are not often chosen by foreign musicians of reputation as a time to effect their débuts here, but this year two men, both of considerable note, have pitched upon these latter days for their introduction. One of them, Mr. Ernst von Dohnányi, a young Hungarian pianist, made his first appearance here last night at Carnegie Hall, at the tenth and final New York concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other, Mr. Ernst von Schuch, conductor of the Royal Opera, Dresden, arrived from Europe yesterday for a fortnight's visit, and will conduct two concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House within ten days.

Such short trips mean that these musical visitors would like to repeat the American tour on a larger scale next winter. and if Mr. von Schuch proves as interesting and accomplished a conductor as Mr. Dohnányi did a pianist last night, both will be welcomed by future New York audiences.

Mr. Dohnányi chose the fourth Beethoven piano concerto, in G major, as the vehicle for his entrance here. It was a fortunate selection, for the pianist's style appeared well adapted to disclose its beauties. Mr. Dohnányi read the solo part with breadth, contrast and a sense of its solidity and dignity. He made no effort to sentimentalize the music, holding aloof, indeed, from color and richness in his tone, especially in the first movement, when these qualities might have been effective, used in moderation. He showed an unexpected domination of a feeling for classicism, in this movement, though this took the form of a dignified simplicity, rather than of dryness or formalism.

It was in the two cadenzas, both of his own composition, and in the second movement, that Mr. Dohnányi revealed a more romantic side of his art. His cadenzas were no mere fireworks, but showed a logical development from material at hand in the concerto, carried through remote keys and arranged so as to afford a contrast to the preceding music. The cadenzas seemed curiously modern in spirit, compared with the rest, but that was inevitable. They incidentally brought in some long legato phrases quite grateful after the shorter ones of the Beethoven score. In a word, Mr. Dohnányi made a good impression last night as a reader of Beethoven.

Technically, the young Hungarian has a strong equipment. Accuracy, boldness and power were combined in his clean touch, and asserted themselves especially in some of the difficult ascending passages of the movement, and in the proclamation of the melodic material of the same division. A certain legato quality seemed lacking, and a hardness was occasionally felt. His left hand was noticeably strong, but his touch seemed even and fully under control. No dexterous passage in this Beethoven concerto appeared to give the pianist any trouble.

The occasions for sensuous beauty of tone are not numerous or extended enough in this concerto to show conclusively whether a pianist be master of this valuable quality. So far as could be discovered last night, this is not Mr. Dohnányi's strongest point, but there will probably be better opportunities later to form a clearer idea. On the whole, Mr. Dohnányi proved a pianist well worth hearing. The audience gave him a cordial welcome, and the applause was genuine and well deserved. Mr. Gericke and the band provided a superb accompaniment, if it be fair to use such a term.

(From New York "Commercial Advertiser," March 23, 1900.)

THE last Boston Symphony concert of the season, given in Carnegie Hall last night, was also one of the best, for the program was interesting and superbly played, and a new pianist made a most favorable impression.

The soloist was Ernst von Dohnányi, a young Hungarian, who in the last two years has won much solid success in England and Europe. He has come to this country little heralded by advance agents, and it is likely that few of the audience last night who do not keep closely in touch with the musical world knew much about him. In Beethoven's G major concerto he won a most solid success. Few young pianists (he is only twenty-two) have shown such solid and musicianly attainments as did this young man. The impression left is that he is first a musician and then a pianist. What he may do in music of the romantic school is yet to be seen, but as an expounder of Beethoven he is a most worthy pupil of his master, Eugen d'Albert. His tone is mellow, yet brilliant. He has a fine command of color effects, which he used with admirable discretion. There are few opportunities for virtuosity pure and simple in this concerto, but he gave ample evidence of the possession of a fine technique, especially in the cadenzas, which were of his own composition, and, it may be added, showed much musical skill. His work was characterized by a sober and healthy restraint. He was entirely free from the affectations and eccentricities which so often mar the pleasure one receives from a pianist, and yet he held the close attention of the audience during all the time he was at his instrument. It is to be hoped that he will soon be heard in recital.

(From New York "Evening Sun," March 23, 1900.)

THE last concert to be given in New York this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Carnegie Hall last evening. Mr. Gericke presented an attractive program, the feature of special interest being the New York début of the young Hungarian pianist, Ernst von Dohnányi, who made such a favorable impression on the occasion of his American début at Cambridge last week.

Von Dohnányi is still a very young man, and there is as little of braggadocio in his appearance as there is in his playing, which is quite remarkable, considering that a bombastic self-assertiveness is prone to be a predominating characteristic of the majority of piano virtuosos now before the public. He gave a distinctly dignified reading of Beethoven's Fourth Concerto, which he chose as the medium of his entrée here, and displayed an intellectual grasp and a keen artistic perception that made his ability immediately apparent. He has temperament, but it is absolutely under his control, and this, combined with his well-rounded technique, his delicacy of touch and refinement of expression, made his performance a distinctly artistic achievement.

The pianist played [illegible], which were well wrought out, in the spirit of the concerto. The orchestral accompaniment, with the exception of some discrepancies in the first movement, and the Rondo, was quite all that could be desired. Von Dohnányi was enthusiastically applauded, and had to respond to repeated recalls.

(From New York "Evening World," March 23, 1900.)

New Pianist Makes a Hit.

Von Dohnányi, a Young Hungarian, Heard at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Farewell Concert.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall last night served to introduce to New York music lovers a new pianist, Ernst von Dohnányi, already well-known in Europe. He is a young, solidly built, strong-faced, dark-haired Hungarian, with just the suggestion of a budding mustache and a smile of great sweetness. For his initial effort he chose Beethoven's G major concerto, and it may be said at once that his début was most successful. His playing is poetic, yet virile; his touch clean-cut and incisive, without any caressing suggestiveness. A lofty sentiment and sympathy pervaded his reading last night. His tone is full and of exquisite singing quality. He was recalled again and again.

A large and brilliant audience enjoyed the concert to the full, and made manifest its regret that it was the farewell appearance for the season of this superb band.

(From New York "Evening Journal," March 24, 1900.)

IT was a genuine musical treat to hear Mr. Ernst von Dohnányi's poetic rendition of Beethoven's fourth concerto. How refreshing to have the piano treated gently, after the cuffing and banging it often has at the hands of modern virtuosi.

It was also delightful to hear this beautiful concerto again. He played it reverently, and sank his own individuality to bring out more prominently the classic simplicity and meaning of the composition. He also subordinated his technic to meet these ends. One could tell that he had a lot of reserve power and technic, but he had these absolutely in control, and it was another striking evidence of dignified musicianship that he did not try to make an effect with them.

He has a soft, sweetly singing touch, and made the slow movement dreamy and poetic. Perhaps it would have been more effective if played somewhat more impetuously, so as to work up to its dramatic climax, but Mr. Dohnányi's conception was lovely in its peaceful repose.

In the last movement, and also in the first, his finger work was strongly certain. His cadenzas were just modern enough to satisfy the ear after the beautiful simplicity of the preceding music. Mr. Dohnányi won much applause and deservedly. New Yorkers have reason to be grateful to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the delightful series of concerts they have given here during the season. In point of interest and dignity these concerts ranked above everything else musical.

APRIL 1, 1900

The concert at the Music Hall Tuesday night given by the Musical Art Society of New York, Mr. Frank Damrosch directing, must be put down as a leading society as well as musical event of the week and one which well deserved the interest which was shown by the large audience. One could scarcely believe that the platform of the dingy old Music Hall could take on so attractive and even elegant appearance as was given it by the noble palms, some 25 feet tall, which were placed at the sides and back, and the ropes of laurel bordering the front of the stage and reaching far overhead. The well set up chorus, too, was a revelation, and one would have known at first sight that the women were not to the Boston musical manner born. They were in full evening dress, every one of them, and their white gowns, with the pale blues, yellows and pinks, combined to make an exquisite wave of coloring and were a splendid setting for well rounded shoulders and arms. On looking down upon the stage from the balcony it was really most impressive before a note had been sung, and the question involuntarily came to one's mind, why can't similar Boston organizations, in a measure, at least, try for the same effect.

Some of these there were Maj. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, who brought quite a party; Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and Miss Schlesinger, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas C. Thacher, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Mr. William R. Cabot, Dr. and Mrs. Oliver Wadsworth, Mrs. Ogden Codman, Mr. Hugh Codman, the Hon. Edward Atkinson and party, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mrs. Henry M. Whitney and Miss Whitney, Mr. R. M. Cushing, Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wheelwright, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. W. P. Blake and Miss Blake, Miss Lena Little, Mrs. Thacher Loring, Mr. Pierson Beebe, Mrs. J. Emery Tippett, Miss Tippett, Mr. Johnson Morton, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mr. Warren Kellogg, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Clement Houghton, Miss Mary Bullard, Mrs. Ebenezer Gay, with her son, Mr. E. Howard Gay; Mme. de Angelis, Mrs. Gardner, Miss Fanny French, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Norris Milliken, Col. Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Osgood, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. Eliot Mayo, Mr. Arthur Maynard, Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mr. Eugene Hagar and Miss Hagar, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Tucker, Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Estabrook, Mr. C. C. Ryder, Prof. Buck, Mr. and Mrs. Norman McLeod, Miss Osgood and Dr. Hamilton Osgood.

The society dined together at the Parker House before the concert, and afterward they had time for supper before leaving on the midnight train for New York.

BOSTON COURIER,

MARCH 31, 1900

THE MUSICAL ART SOCIETY—THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

In those good old days when the Boylston Club lived and sang, Mr. Osgood did not let a season pass by without dignifying the Christmas or the Eastertide with something rare and strange drawn from the illimitable treasures of ancient ecclesiastical music, wisely chosen and reverently performed. But lately such music is heard no more, unless the Cecilia happens to take up some simple single composition in a general concert. It was good, therefore, that the Musical Art Society of New York came to Boston on Tuesday evening and presented in Music Hall a programme almost entirely made up of that elder church music, including the wonderfully interwoven harmonies of Palestrina's pure and pathetic "Stabat Mater," an eight part "Crucifixus" of Lotti, a lovely hymn of Haydn and Bach's "Ode of Mourning" cantata. The society, which consists of about fifty professional singers, exists for the sole purpose of performing such music and its members have the encouragement of a sufficient pecuniary remuneration for their study time as well as of distinguished, fashionable and cultivated patronage and an eminent directorate. The results, obtained under the intelligent and judicious direction of Mr. Frank Damrosch are fine and honorable, and the passing defects are merely technical—such as a not ever equal balance of tone, an occasional deflection from the pitch in some difficult profession, or a little sharpness of tone as if from slightly over urged upper voices. But such main matters as the steady mutual cling of the unaccompanied voices, the even march of chords, the contrast of volume and co[illegible], the development of dynamic gradations and the sympathetically intellectual shaping and em-are brought well nigh to per-instruction as well as pleasure to ared to listen as he should.

THE BOSTON

SATURDAY EVENING

Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813

March 31

The Musical Art Society.

The Musical Art Society of New York, Mr. Frank Damrosch director, gave its first concert in Boston in Music Hall on Tuesday evening. The program was:

Crucifixus .... Lotti
Stabat Mater .... Palestrina
Caligaverunt oculi mei...... Michael Haydn
Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen............ Michael Praetorius
Comest Thou, Light of Gladness........ H. von Herzogenberg
Ode of Mourning................ J. S. Bach
"Gold'ne Fluren" and Wiegdnlier". Dvorak
"Ay Wakin O!" and "Ye Banks and Braes," arranged by H. A. Lambeth.
Liebe dir ergeb' ich mich..... P. Cornelius

It was a most artistic recital, and the ambition of the society is worthy of the very highest praise. The works produced gave evidence of the most careful study and intelligent direction; in gradation of tone, in light and shade, in precision of attack the singers were at their best. On the other hand neither the quality nor volume of tone produced is striking, there was an absence of brilliancy and of proportion, and more than an occasional lapse from the true pitch. It was a delight to hear the Palestrina "Stabat Mater" and to imagine the tremendous effect it would produce when given under proper conditions. It is doubtful if a fair idea could be formed of the Bach work in the abridged form in which it was given; but there was not the slightest doubt about the beauty and fascination of the Haydn selection, or of the artistic and effective manner in which it was interpreted. A society that has the lofty aims of the Musical Art Society of New York cannot fail to be educational in the highest sense of the word; its work is particularly needed at the present time, when a love for things formless, noisy and ugly has almost become an epidemic in the art world. Mr. Damrosch and his fellow artists are to be heartily congratulated on the solidity of their work, on their artistic sincerity, and on the favorable effect they produced on a most discriminating and enthusiastic audience.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Musical Event at the Coliseum Last Night.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now in their nineteenth concert season, played before an overflowing and extremely appreciative audience at the Coliseum last evening. The program was opened with Franz Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, two numbers, I, Allegro moderato, II, Andante con moto, E minor. This is a marvelous piece of work, full of rich harmony and prolific in original ideas and delicate movements.

The second number was by Franz Liszt, concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E flat major, and was the feature of the evening, introducing Mr. Ernst Von Dolmanyi, the noted pianist, who played with inspiring distinctiveness and perfect execution. The orchestral work was strong and rich and showed mature conception and execution. The applause was overwhelming, and the tempest of acclaim brought out the soloist again and again.

The next number on the program was by Edward Hagerup Grieg, Suite No. 1, from the music to "Peer Gyut," op. 46. The first movement of this suite, (Morning Mood), contains a pastoral theme on the strings, interrupted first by the 'celli, now again the theme, which is taken up by the reed instruments, and then the horns, and finally dies away with soft smoothness into the end. The second movement (The Death of Aase) is a short, sorrowful lay, played with covered strings, and leaves a lasting impression. The third movement (Anaitra's Dance) is also with covered strings, in which the triangle chimes out a dainty, skipping air, which is very restful after the more pretentious numbers. The fourth and last movement (In the Hall of the Mountain King) was weird, and filled with passages of Satanic order.

The fourth number of the program was a suite of two items by Richard Wagner, and is opened by the 'celli, in a slow, moody, passage, which is at the same time broad and noble, and ends with the full orchestra in a graceful and beautiful melody, which is delightfully blended. The second number in the suite begins in a rather slow, pensive manner and works up into a little song as of welcome, and then swells fourth with a full chorus, and again dies away like the sobbing and wailing of a lost soul, and then gradually increases in volume until it swells forth in tremendous volume as though the whole world were full of joy and song.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor, is a powerful man in his capacity and inspires his orchestra, who are ever on the alert, and responded to every movement of his magic baton.

MONDAY, APRIL 2, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twentieth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Schubert: Overture to "Alfonso und Estrella," opus 69.
Saint-Saëns: "La Fiancée du Timbalier," Ballad with Orchestra, opus 82.
Grieg: Suite No. 1, from the Music to "Peer Gynt," opus 46.
Wagner: Songs (the Accompaniment scored for Orchestra by Mottl)—"Schmerzen," "Träume."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56.

Mme. Marie Brema was the singer.

The performance of Schubert's "Alfonso und Estrella" overture was a revelation—to one listener at least. This overture used to be a warhorse of the Harvard Musical Association, and I used to abominate it heartily; the second theme seemed to me trivial beyond endurance, notwithstanding all Dresel's well-meant endeavors to make me like it. I was quite prepared to dislike it more than ever last Saturday evening; but no! there was something in Mr. Gericke's reading that showed the thing in a new light, and I enjoyed it thoroughly; the second theme, far from sounding trivial, seemed very charming, even elegant. Thus do we live and learn.

After the A minor pianoforte concerto and the G minor quartet, Grieg's first suite from "Peer Gynt" seems to me about the best thing we have had from him. The grace of the opening pastoral and of Anitra's dance is very genuine and appealing, the tender pathos of Aase's death, equally true and penetrating; it has been proved to me by several people—as far as argument can prove anything—that the last movement is terribly vulgar; but, for the life of me, I cannot feel it to be so. There is a vein of quasi-comic cynicism in it which seems to me to fit the situation to a T; as Beethoven said of the awful music in the incantation scene of Weber's "Freischütz," that, given the situation, he did not see how the scene could have been set to music in any other way, so do I feel about this scene in the Hall of the Mountain King; I cannot help enjoying it. For one thing, the performance was masterly.

Excepting the Vivace in F Major, which can be placed beside anything of its sort in the whole field of music, the "Scotch" symphony shows, to my mind, the moribund side of Mendelssohn mainly. True, the symphony is a wonderfully fine piece of musical architecture, and there is unquestionably a vast deal of beauty of outline in it; the colouring is not over-rich, it is true, but it fits the form; the work might have been more brilliantly, but I do not see how it could have been better, scored. But the rather flaccid song-without-words vein of melody in the first movement does not lend itself kindly to such vast developments; even Mendelssohn's phenomenal technics cannot veil the disproportion between the character of the thematic material and the inflated dimensions of the movement. The theme of the Adagio is cheap, its ever-recurring upward skip of a major 7th, vulgar, without any passionate conviction to save its vulgarity; Mendelssohn was not the man to clasp his chest with both hands and wriggle his torso like an opera tenor with effect; and this is, upon the whole, just what this melody does. Barring the scherzo, which is a gem of genius fit to outlive the ages, I like the finale best; it has been pooh-poohed enough in all conscience, but I cannot but find it very lively and poetic. All but that 6-8 peroration, which is perhaps as dismal a failure as anything the composer ever wrote. One can hardly believe that fond friends thought at one time that the man who could write that could write a successful opera! The performance of the whole symphony was admirable; in the scherzo Mr. Gericke seemed rather to ignore the "non troppo" in the tempo-marking, taking the movement at lightning speed; it was all very effective in its way, but I think a shade slower tempo would have given the rhythm more swing.

Saint-Saëns's "Fiancée du Timbalier" is a brilliantly clever piece of work—Saint-Saëns is nothing if not clever—but falls considerably short of the brilliancy of Victor Hugo's poem. Victor Hugo can hardly have written anything with a more exciting and unflagging verve than this ballad; from beginning to just before the end, it is a continuous climax, with but one interruption—the passage about the old gypsy, which furnishes a welcome contrast—and, by the time the heroine cries out, "Voici les timbaliers," your heart has got to thumping at a great rate; the sudden tragic catastrophe is effective, in spite of the self-consciousness, the transparent affectation of simplicity, with which it is written. To all of this Saint-Saëns has furnished an appropriate musical background, rather than absorbed it into a composition of genius. The music is intelligently adequate, but not sublimating; it does not spoil sport, so to speak, but adds nothing. Mme. Brema sang it grandly, with infinite verve and brilliancy; pity only that she did not change her manner in the last stanza, where the narrator steps in; it seems to me that, following out Victor Hugo's idea, this ought to be sung with stony, blood-curdling indifference, not with tragic pathos. The poet's assumed nonchalance—as who should say "rien que la mort!"—ought to be reflected in the delivery.

Mme. Brema sang the two Wagner songs very beautifully indeed. Except "Im Treibhause," these two songs are the best of the set; in "Schmerzen," in particular, Wagner comes nearer to the best Lied style than anywhere else in his works. I have always found "Träume" a little irritating, because so inferior to the scene in "Tristan" that Wagner afterwards developed out of it; but I own that this feeling is beginning to wear off. Felix Mottl's orchestration of the accompaniments is really splendid, done with due help got from consulting Wagner's own scores. In "Träume" he as nearly reproduces the coloring in the corresponding passages in "Tristan" as can be done without a bass-clarinet; his single trumpet in "Schmerzen"—probably suggested by the "Siegfried-Idyll"—is superbly effective; throughout he has been guided by the contents of the poem, in the true Wagner way. Mme. Brema was deservedly applauded and recalled with unfeigned enthusiasm.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho," opus 44; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, concerto for pianoforte, in C-sharp minor, opus 45 (first time); Rameau-Mottl, ballet suite (first time); Borodin, symphony No. 1. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the pianist.

APRIL [illegible], 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

I had not heard enough when the program was brought to a close, last evening. After but a taste of what can be done by this most wonderful of orchestras and a pianist of such ability as Ernst Von Dohnanyi it was in a sense disappointing to be cut off so abruptly with a short program and not an encore of any description. Conductor Gericke was there with his musicians, about 75 in number, including Mr. Kneisel, Alwin Schroeder and others, but not Mr. Adamowski. The large audience was all seated and the doors closed before a bow was drawn or a note sounded. All was quiet and in readiness for the first strains of the Schubert "Unfinished Symphony" which came upon one like the breath of some unseen being, the low deep tones of the 'celli and double basses being the introductory measures, after which the violins take up the accompaniment, followed by the theme introduction by oboes and clarinets. The melody is a plaintive one, and the developments of the theme is gradual to the climax where it is abruptly stopped and held in the balance by a sustained D with horns and bassoons. Modulation process begins and the themes are repeated and elaborated until the first movement is brought to a close with a short coda.

The second movement is the Andante Con Moto in 3-8 time. This movement is started by the strings and the loud forte passage is quickly taken up by the wood winds and brass as a subsidiary which is followed by a clarinet solo as an entrance to the second theme. The usual modulations follow and a subsidiary is again taken up, this time by full orchestra and the movement is finished by a D major theme with a coda. The symphony is deep and all there is in it is extracted in a Schubert style only, by Mr. Gericke.

Ernst Von Dohnanyi, who is a Hungarian pianist of the Paderewski type, was very favorably received, last evening, and in fact so enthusiastically applauded that an encore should have been given as an acknowledgment of the appreciation. His selection of a Liszt concerto with orchestra accompaniment was a most fortunate one and all seemed to be of one opinion, namely, that it was the best production of its kind ever heard in Hartford. The work is a symphonic poem and a most difficult concerto to execute. Mr. Dohnanyi was its master at all times and the absolute precision and correctness by both pianist and orchestra made the rendering the remarkable success that it was.

The Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite was all that was anticipated and more too. The music of this suite was written by Grieg for Ibsen's drama, and the selection was made for concert performance by Grieg himself. The first movement, "Allegretto pastorale," consists of the development of a single theme, the melody being carried by the cello throughout. The accompaniment is of a rolling arpeggio style which was made very effective by the strings and wood winds. The second movement, "Andante doloroso," is played with muted strings. It portrays the death of Aase, the mother of Peer Gynt, and is sombre in the extreme. This is followed by the third movement, also in pianissimo and Mazurka tempo. The fourth and last movement seemed to be the most pleasing to last evening's audience. It accompanies the scene in which Peer Gynt is hunted by imps and the characterization of the movement is "a veritable musical hornets' nest."

The Wagner number, the last on the program, is taken from "Die Meistersinger," which is a musical comedy and a comic companion to Tannhauser. The selections given last evening were taken from the original score. There was some disappointment that some of the heavier Wagner music was not chosen, but it was Wagner in every phase and touched the desired emotion.

The Teachers' guild made a decided success of this venture and great credit is due them for even this short visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the eminent young soloist, Ernst Von Dohnanyi, who appeared for the first time in this city.

[97]

SUNDAY HER
APRIL 1, 1900.

The concert at the Music Hall Tuesday night given by the Musical Art Society of New York, Mr. Frank Damrosch directing, must be put down as a leading society as well as musical event of the week and one which well deserved the interest which was shown by the large audience. One could scarcely believe that the platform of the dingy old Music Hall could take on so attractive and even elegant appearance as was given it by the noble palms, some 25 feet tall, which were placed at the sides and back, and the ropes of laurel bordering the front of the stage and reaching far overhead. The well set up chorus, too, was a revelation, and one would have known at first sight that the women were not to the Boston musical manner born. They were in full evening dress, every one of them, and their white gowns, with the pale blues, yellows and pinks, combined to make an exquisite wave of coloring and were a splendid setting for well rounded shoulders and arms. On looking down upon the stage from the balcony it was really most impressive before a note had been sung, and the question involuntarily came to one's mind, why can't similar Boston organizations, in a measure, at least, try for the same effect.

Some of those there were Maj. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, who brought quite a party; Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger and Miss Schlesinger, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas C. Thacher, Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Mr. William R. Cabot, Dr. and Mrs. Oliver Wadsworth, Mrs. Ogden Codman, Mr. Hugh Codman, the Hon. Edward Atkinson and party, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mrs. Henry M. Whitney and Miss Whitney, Mr. R. M. Cushing, Mr. and Mrs. I. Tucker Burr, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wheelwright, Mrs. Apthorp, Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Lang, Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Mr. W. P. Blake and Miss Blake, Miss Lena Little, Mrs. Thacher Loring, Mr. Pierson Beebe, Mrs. J. Emery Tippett, Miss Tippett, Mr. Johnson Morton, Mr. and Mrs. F. P. Vinton, Mr. Warren Kellogg, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. and Mrs. Clement Houghton, Miss Mary Bullard, Mrs. Ebenezer Gay, with her son, Mr. E. Howard Gay; Mme. de Angelis, Mrs. Gardner, Miss Fanny French, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Norris Milliken, Col. Hallowell, Mr. and Mrs. George L. Osgood, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mrs. Eliot Mayo, Mr. Arthur Maynard, Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mr. Eugene Hagar and Miss Hagar, Mr. and Mrs. Hiram Tucker, Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Estabrook, Mr. C. C. Ryder, Prof. Buck, Mr. and Mrs. Norman McLeod, Miss Osgood and Dr. Hamilton Osgood.

The society dined together at the Parker House before the concert, and afterward they had time for supper before leaving on the midnight train for New York.

BOSTON COURIER,
MARCH 31, 1900.

THE MUSICAL ART SOCIETY—THE SYMPHONY, ETC.

In those good old days when the Boylston Club lived and sang, Mr. Osgood did not let a season pass by without dignifying the Christmas or the Eastertide with something rare and strange drawn from the illimitable treasures of ancient ecclesiastical music, wisely chosen and reverently performed. But lately such music is heard no more, unless the Cecilia happens to take up some simple single composition in a general concert. It was good, therefore, that the Musical Art Society of New York came to Boston on Tuesday evening and presented in Music Hall a programme almost entirely made up of that elder church music, including the wonderfully interwoven harmonies of Palestrina's pure and pathetic "Stabat Mater," an eight part "Crucifixus" of Lotti, a lovely hymn of Haydn and Bach's "Ode of Mourning" cantata. The society, which consists of about fifty professional singers, exists for the sole purpose of performing such music and its members have the encouragement of a sufficient pecuniary remuneration for their study time as well as of distinguished, fashionable and cultivated patronage and an eminent directorate. The results, obtained under the intelligent and judicious direction of Mr. Frank Damrosch are fine and honorable, and the passing defects are merely technical—such as a not ever equal balance of tone, an occasional deflection from the pitch in some difficult profession, or a little sharpness of tone, as if from slightly over urged upper voices. But such main matters as the steady mutual cling of the unaccompanied voices, the even march of chords, the contrast of volume and color, the development of dynamic gradations and the sympathetically intellectual shaping and em- [illegible] ses, are brought well nigh to per- [illegible] e instruction as well as pleasure to [illegible] ared to listen as he should.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813

March 31

The Musical Art Society.

The Musical Art Society of New York, Mr. Frank Damrosch director, gave its first concert in Boston in Music Hall on Tuesday evening. The program was:

Crucifixus .... Lotti
Stabat Mater .... Palestrina
Caligaverunt oculi mei...... Michael Haydn
Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen............
Michael Praetorius
Comest Thou, Light of Gladness........
H. von Herzogenberg
Ode of Mourning................. J. S. Bach
"Gold'ne Fluren" and Wiegdnlier". Dvorak
"Ay Wakin O!" and "Ye Banks and Braes," arranged by H. A. Lambeth.
Liebe dir ergeb' ich mich..... P. Cornelius

It was a most artistic recital, and the ambition of the society is worthy of the very highest praise. The works produced gave evidence of the most careful study and intelligent direction; in gradation of tone, in light and shade, in precision of attack the singers were at their best. On the other hand neither the quality nor volume of tone produced is striking, there was an absence of brilliancy and of proportion, and more than an occasional lapse from the true pitch. It was a delight to hear the Palestrina "Stabat Mater" and to imagine the tremendous effect it would produce when given under proper conditions. It is doubtful if a fair idea could be formed of the Bach work in the abridged form in which it was given; but there was not the slightest doubt about the beauty and fascination of the Haydn selection, or of the artistic and effective manner in which it was interpreted. A society that has the lofty aims of the Musical Art Society of New York cannot fail to be educational in the highest sense of the word; its work is particularly needed at the present time, when a love for things formless, noisy and ugly has almost become an epidemic in the art world. Mr. Damrosch and his fellow artists are to be heartily congratulated on the solidity of their work, on their artistic sincerity, and on the favorable effect they produced on a most discriminating and enthusiastic audience.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Musical Event at the Coliseum Last Night.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now in their nineteenth concert season, played before an overflowing and extremely appreciative audience at the Coliseum last evening. The program was opened with Franz Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, two numbers, I, Allegro moderato, II, Andante con moto, E minor. This is a marvelous piece of work, full of rich harmony and prolific in original ideas and delicate movements.

The second number was by Franz Listz, concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, in E flat major, and was the feature of the evening, introducing Mr. Ernst Von Dolmanyi, the noted pianist, who played with inspiring distinctiveness and perfect execution. The orchestral work was strong and rich and showed mature conception and execution. The applause was overwhelming, and the tempest of acclaim brought out the soloist again and again.

The next number on the program was by Edward Hagerup Grieg, Suite No. 1, from the music to "Peer Gyut," op. 46. The first movement of this suite, (Morning Mood), contains a pastoral theme on the strings, interrupted first by the 'celli, now again the theme, which is taken up by the reed instruments, and then the horns, and finally dies away with soft smoothness into the end. The second movement (The Death of Aase) is a short, sorrowful lay, played with covered strings, and leaves a lasting impression. The third movement (Anaitra's Dance) is also with covered strings, in which the triangle chimes out a dainty, skipping air, which is very restful after the more pretentious numbers. The fourth and last movement (In the Hall of the Mountain King) was weird, and filled with passages of Satanic order.

The fourth number of the program was a suite of two items by Richard Wagner, and is opened by the 'celli, in a slow, moody, passage, which is at the same time broad and noble, and ends with the full orchestra in a graceful and beautiful melody, which is delightfully blended. The second number in the suite begins in a rather slow, pensive manner and works up into a little song as of welcome, and then swells fourth with a full chorus, and again dies away like the sobbing and wailing of a lost soul, and then gradually increases in volume until it swells forth in tremendous volume as though the whole world were full of joy and song.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor, is a powerful man in his capacity and inspires his orchestra, who are ever on the alert, and responded to every movement of his magic baton.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 2, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twentieth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Schubert: Overture to "Alfonso und Estrella," opus 69.
Saint-Saëns: "La Fiancée du Timbalier," Ballad with Orchestra, opus 82.
Grieg: Suite No. 1, from the Music to "Peer Gynt," opus 46.
Wagner: Songs (the Accompaniment scored for Orchestra by Mottl)—"Schmerzen," "Träume."
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56.

Mme. Marie Brema was the singer.

The performance of Schubert's "Alfonso und Estrella" overture was a revelation—to one listener at least. This overture used to be a warhorse of the Harvard Musical Association, and I used to abominate it heartily; the second theme seemed to me trivial beyond endurance, notwithstanding all Dresel's well-meant endeavors to make me like it. I was quite prepared to dislike it more than ever last Saturday evening; but no! there was something in Mr. Gericke's reading that showed the thing in a new light, and I enjoyed it thoroughly; the second theme, far from sounding trivial, seemed very charming, even elegant. Thus do we live and learn.

After the A minor pianoforte concerto and the G minor quartet, Grieg's first suite from "Peer Gynt" seems to me about the best thing we have had from him. The grace of the opening pastoral and of Anitra's dance is very genuine and appealing, the tender pathos of Aase's death, equally true and penetrating; it has been proved to me by several people—as far as argument can prove anything—that the last movement is terribly vulgar; but, for the life of me, I cannot feel it to be so. There is a vein of quasi-comic cynicism in it which seems to me to fit the situation to a T; as Beethoven said of the awful music in the incantation scene of Weber's "Freischütz," that, given the situation, he did not see how the scene could have been set to music in any other way, so do I feel about this scene in the Hall of the Mountain King; I cannot help enjoying it. For one thing, the performance was masterly.

Excepting the Vivace in F Major, which can be placed beside anything of its sort in the whole field of music, the "Scotch" symphony shows, to my mind, the moribund side of Mendelssohn mainly. True, the symphony is a wonderfully fine piece of musical architecture, and there is unquestionably a vast deal of beauty of outline in it; the colouring is not over-rich, it is true, but it fits the form; the work might have been more brilliantly, but I do not see how it could have been better, scored. But the rather flaccid song-without-words vein of melody in the first movement does not lend itself kindly to such vast developments; even Mendelssohn's phenomenal technics cannot veil the disproportion between the character of the thematic material and the inflated dimensions of the movement. The theme of the Adagio is cheap, its ever-recurring upward skip of a major 7th, vulgar, without any passionate conviction to save its vulgarity; Mendelssohn was not the man to clasp his chest with both hands and wriggle his torso like an opera tenor with effect; and this is, upon the whole, just what this melody does. Barring the scherzo, which is a gem of genius fit to outlive the ages, I like the finale best; it has been pooh-poohed enough in all conscience, but I cannot but find it very lively and poetic. All but that 6-8 peroration, which is perhaps as dismal a failure as anything the composer ever wrote. One can hardly believe that fond friends thought at one time that the man who could write that could write a successful opera! The performance of the whole symphony was admirable; in the scherzo Mr. Gericke seemed rather to ignore the "non troppo" in the tempo-marking, taking the movement at lightning speed; it was all very effective in its way, but I think a shade slower tempo would have given the rhythm more swing.

Saint-Saëns's "Fiancée du Timbalier" is a brilliantly clever piece of work—Saint-Saëns is nothing if not clever—but falls considerably short of the brilliancy of Victor Hugo's poem. Victor Hugo can hardly have written anything with a more exciting and unflagging verve than this ballad; from beginning to just before the end, it is a continuous climax, with but one interruption—the passage about the old gypsy, which furnishes a welcome contrast—and, by the time the heroine cries out, "Voici les timbaliers," your heart has got to thumping at a great rate; the sudden tragic catastrophe is effective, in spite of the self-consciousness, the transparent affectation of simplicity, with which it is written. To all of this Saint-Saëns has furnished an appropriate musical background, rather than absorbed it into a composition of genius. The music is intelligently adequate, but not sublimating; it does not spoil sport, so to speak, but adds nothing. Mme. Brema sang it grandly, with infinite verve and brilliancy; pity only that she did not change her manner in the last stanza, where the narrator steps in; it seems to me that, following out Victor Hugo's idea, this ought to be sung with stony, blood-curdling indifference, not with tragic pathos. The poet's assumed nonchalance—as who should say "rien que la mort!"—ought to be reflected in the delivery.

Mme. Brema sang the two Wagner songs very beautifully indeed. Except "Im Treibhause," these two songs are the best of the set; in "Schmerzen," in particular, Wagner comes nearer to the best Lied style than anywhere else in his works. I have always found "Träume" a little irritating, because so inferior to the scene in "Tristan" that Wagner afterwards developed out of it; but I own that this feeling is beginning to wear off. Felix Mottl's orchestration of the accompaniments is really splendid, done with due help got from consulting Wagner's own scores. In "Träume" he as nearly reproduces the coloring in the corresponding passages in "Tristan" as can be done without a bass-clarinet; his single trumpet in "Schmerzen"—probably suggested by the "Siegfried-Idyll"—is superbly effective; throughout he has been guided by the contents of the poem, in the true Wagner way. Mme. Brema was deservedly applauded and recalled with unfeigned enthusiasm.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture to "Sappho," opus 44; Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, concerto for pianoforte, in C-sharp minor, opus 45 (first time); Rameau-Mottl, ballet suite (first time); Borodin, symphony No. 1. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach will be the pianist.

W. F. A.

APRIL 5, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

I had not heard enough when the program was brought to a close, last evening. After but a taste of what can be done by this most wonderful of orchestras and a pianist of such ability as Ernst Von Dohnanyi it was in a sense disappointing to be cut off so abruptly with a short program and not an encore of any description. Conductor Gericke was there with his musicians, about 75 in number, including Mr. Kneisel, Alwin Schroeder and others, but not Mr. Adamowski. The large audience was all seated and the doors closed before a bow was drawn or a note sounded. All was quiet and in readiness for the first strains of the Schubert "Unfinished Symphony" which came upon one like the breath of some unseen being, the low deep tones of the 'celli and double basses being the introductory measures, after which the violins take up the accompaniment, followed by the theme introduction by oboes and clarinets. The melody is a plaintive one, and the developments of the theme is gradual to the climax where it is abruptly stopped and held in the balance by a sustained D with horns and bassoons. Modulation process begins and the themes are repeated and elaborated until the first movement is brought to a close with a short coda.

The second movement is the Andante Con Moto in 3-8 time. This movement is started by the strings and the loud forte passage is quickly taken up by the wood winds and brass as a subsidiary which is followed by a clarinet solo as an entrance to the second theme. The usual modulations follow and a subsidiary is again taken up, this time by full orchestra and the movement is finished by a D major theme with a coda. The symphony is deep and all there is in it is extracted in a Schubert style only, by Mr. Gericke.

Ernst Von Dohnanyi, who is a Hungarian pianist of the Paderewski type, was very favorably received, last evening, and in fact so enthusiastically applauded that an encore should have been given as an acknowledgment of the appreciation. His selection of a Liszt concerto with orchestra accompaniment was a most fortunate one and all seemed to be of one opinion, namely, that it was the best production of its kind ever heard in Hartford. The work is a symphonic poem and a most difficult concerto to execute. Mr. Dohnanyi was its master at all times and the absolute precision and correctness by both pianist and orchestra made the rendering the remarkable success that it was.

The Grieg "Peer Gynt" suite was all that was anticipated and more too. The music of this suite was written by Grieg for Ibsen's drama, and the selection was made for concert performance by Grieg himself. The first movement, "Allegretto pastorale," consists of the development of a single theme, the melody being carried by the cello throughout. The accompaniment is of a rolling arpeggio style which was made very effective by the strings and wood winds. The second movement, "Andante doloroso," is played with muted strings. It portrays the death of Aase, the mother of Peer Gynt, and is sombre in the extreme. This is followed by the third movement, also in pianissimo and Mazurka tempo. The fourth and last movement seemed to be the most pleasing to last evening's audience. It accompanies the scene in which Peer Gynt is hunted by imps and the characterization of the movement is "a veritable musical hornets' nest."

The Wagner number, the last on the program, is taken from "Die Meistersinger," which is a musical comedy and a comic companion to Tannhauser. The selections given last evening were taken from the original score. There was some disappointment that some of the heavier Wagner music was not chosen, but it was Wagner in every phase and touched the desired emotion.

The Teachers' guild made a decided success of this venture and great credit is due them for even this short visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the eminent young soloist, Ernst Von Dohnanyi, who appeared for the first time in this city.

[97]

LY TIMES, THURSDAY, APRIL 5, 190

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An extraordinary concert in many respects was that of last night, and one that will brightly and incisively dwell in the memory of the vast audience which attended. It was the first free and plenteous draught of good orchestral music rendered in modern concert style to which our community has been admitted for many months. Time was when three or four Thomas concerts became a regular allowance during the season. And our city was then but half as large, and less than half as cultured in the art. Yet, this is almost the first grand orchestral music we have heard during the present winter. But, it made up! Not in quantity, but in quality, since the programme was singularly short, less than eighty minutes of performance. The announcement had been for 8 o'clock. At 8 half the audience still stood massed on Main street and in the long arcade which leads to the Coliseum gate. And, by the watch, the slow progress from the sidewalk to the door, with the crowd, took twenty-two minutes. Finally at twenty minutes to 9, after the wait and the cold draught through the lattice work, which forms one wall of the arcade, nearly all the people got into their seats and Conductor Gericke raised his baton. At this moment the Coliseum presented a most brilliant appearance. Floor and galleries were alive with people, every one was there and every one was in plain view, and this remarkably brilliant audience gave the impression of vast numbers and eager expectation. The concert began.

If anything more melodious than the two parts of Franz Schubert's unfinished symphony has been composed not many have heard it. It is a flow of exquisite harmony with an emotional color that constantly varies not in the changing themes but frequently in the treatment of the same theme. The one lovely melody is now full of sprightly life, then flashing with abundant joy, palpitating with passion, or dissolved in tenderest love and melancholy. And, under each expression flows a deeper stream that seizes upon the hidden fancies of the soul and floats them. The romance, the warmth, the melodiousness of these strains captivated ear and mind. One might linger long on the musical construction and the original effects of this composition, but it is the poesy of treatment, its melodious qualities, its emotional suggestion that seize upon the audience. And here we also had the proof of the quality of the great orchestra and its famous conductor. With wonderful mastery of technique and perfect solidarity of work and expression they joined a freedom of treatment that almost conveyed the idea of spontaneity. The music was like a river rushing at will—and yet it sparkled with subtle tonal shadings, with daintiness of handling, with brilliancy of effects and a clear, picturesque production that bluffed and delighted the connoisseur and conveyed to him the proof of long art and severe training, inspired by fullest comprehension. Moreover, a bloom of poesy, a fragrance of romantic fancy overlaid it all, and filled the hearer with that joy which a perfect art production imparts. It entered the soul of all. Gericke is academic to the highest degree, but he is a musician and a poetic interpreter in ever fiber of his being. Clear and powerful, shimmering with color and vibrating with tenderness, he renders the score. And the liveliest sympathy between him and the audience is established after the very first number and endures to the last note.

The grand Liszt Concerto brought us a young Hungarian pianist, Ernst von Dohnanyi. He is quite young and of sympathetic appearance. His performance was fascinating, masterful. He held the complicated composition, in its capricious coloring, its strange tone effects, its Moorish exuberance of ornament—in short its excess of Lisztism—in the hollow of his hands, and dealt with the music as if he owned it, and it had always been his. His technique is brilliant—but that is not uncommon. Uncommon is the delicacy of treatment, the tender emotionality of expression, and the rare carrying power of his pianos and pianissimos. The piano did not sing—it fluted. And in the strong passages he rose to the height of the orchestra and kept even pace. It was a magnificent rendition. And around and above him this orchestra wove wonderful measures and painted with all the colors of the Hungarian Abbe's imagination. And the most abstruse and fanciful combinations were rendered with a finish and a live expression that imparted almost floral grace. It was a joy.

Happily we are all familiar, from the Thomas times down, with the charming Grieg Suite which was brought last night: With the pastoral morning movement, like a shepherd sounding his flute as he walks through the dewy clover, a single theme, but wafted in the morning wind and gilded by the early sun; with the solemn march or funeral chant, the treble chords giving majesty of sorrow on muted instruments, as the mother's pale form lies extended; with the dusky allurements of Anita's dance, a mazurka measure whose score is like handfuls of pearls scattered over a golden floor—vivid, full of movement, of warmth, of oriental perfume; with the weird concluding number where the imps and sprites drive Peter out of the Magic Hall, this short-cut brass chords, the dulled sses, the barking winds, the rapid [illegible] of curt measures, the rush of the single motive from one set of instruments to another, the breakneck speed and fortissimo of the whole score. We know them, and such a superb rendition made them more picturesque than ever. For, now the subtle and strange spirit of this creation became vividly manifest, we felt the touch of the Northern magic, and the loveliness of those cool, clear strains. And we saw the weird pictures in a finish and a delicacy of fancy that made us forget the means which brought them. The Grieg Suite moved nearest to the heart of the audience and great was the suggestion applause for a repetition of some of the movements, the dance and the impish chase preferably. But Mr. Gericke would not. Why? It could have broken no art law or disturbed an illusion. However, the warm, inspirational, delicately yet vividly colored production with its perfection of treatment—spiritual and technical—roused a wonderful enthusiasm in the listening masses and the thousands of faces that turned to the orchestra were almost transfigured in expression.

A Wagner number followed, a piecing together of various broad passages from the Meistersinger—a prelude, the dance of apprentices, and the march of the Meistersaenger—all from the third act of the composer's one comic opera. It was very effective, full of sonority and expression and Wagner treatment. Moreover, its splendid mass effects fascinated the ear. But the selection was faulty. Why give a patched number from the music of an opera with which few are acquainted, which has been given less than any other work of the master, and which requires knowledge of the dramatic subject to be fully appreciated? Wagner himself, who composed into the flesh of the text, has demanded a full knowledge of it for the realization of his music. An entire score, a work of pure music, or, if you please, something of which the interpretation lay near to us, could have been substituted with advantage. It was brilliantly rendered—and yet not on the level of former numbers. The dramatic fullness of effect was not in evidence, the pictures were not distinct and telling, the orchestra had not in mind the queer and odd dance of the boys, or the solemn, stately, serio-comic importance of the procession, and could not convey it.

At the close one arose with the feeling that another piano number and a further overture or rhapsodie or tone picture were due—in short, that the musical appetite was not fully satisfied. Having the magnificent orchestra and the magnificent audience there seemed no good reason why the occasion should not be improved to the full. With Oliver Twist we cried for "More!"

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 8, 1900.
(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-first Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. The soloist was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, pianist. The programme offered three interesting orchestral numbers, which were Goldmark's overture, "Sappho," Op. 44, Ballet suite (in three movements), by Rameau, arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl, and Borodin's symphony No. 1, in E flat.

The "Sappho" overture is in Goldmark's happiest vein, and is a most pleasing and effective work. The symphony is not familiar, but has been heard here before, once at least, several years ago. It is a most interesting example of the modern Russian school, though of more conservative tendency than many examples of this school. The symphony was admirably given.

Mrs. Beach played a concerto of her own composition, Op. 45, this being the first performance. The work is neither remarkable for inventive power nor interesting orchestral treatment, though the pianoforte writing is brilliant and elaborate, yet often reminiscent. The work was well performed, and was received with much favor by the audience. Mrs. Beach was recalled several times, and some beautiful floral tributes were presented to her by her friends.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, APRIL 6, 1900

THE NEW MUSIC HALL AND DEPOTS

To the Editor of the Transcript:

In the interest of patrons of the Symphony Rehearsals from a distance, may I call attention through your columns to the extra time which the most rapid transit will require to and from the New Music Hall for reaching both the Southern and Northern terminals? This is a matter of moment to so large a proportion of the afternoon audiences, and especially to those whose return trip occupies two hours of travel, that my one word is not altogether a personal matter. The half or quarter hour's delay means to many an hour's later train and practically closes the door to such music lovers in the coming season. Could the management consider 2 P. M., or 2.15 P. M. for the season of 1900-1901, instead of 2.30, for beginning the afternoon programme? Afternoon performances at all theatres give earlier hours, and the whole aspect would be changed, if the time were thus gained, so that the average programme would end at 4 P. M. Nineteen years' of attendance, with nearly eighty miles of car travel on each rehearsal Friday, and the knowledge that greater sacrifice of time and strength is required of all students outside the city, possibly makes reasonable the writer's plea.

PLYMOUTH

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1900.

Mrs Beach the Soloist at the Symphony Concert.

Dohnanyi's Last Piano Recital—Handel and Haydn Society.

"Cyrano," "The Singing Girl" and Other Offerings of the Near Future.

Two novelties were on last week's symphony program, Mrs H. H. A. Beach's new pianoforte concerto in C sharp minor and a ballet suite by Jean Philippe Rameau, arranged for modern orchestra by Felix Mottl. The other numbers were the overture to Goldmark's "Sapho" and Borodin's symphony in E flat major. Mrs Beach was the solo pianist, and her new work was played for the first time. A single hearing of a composition so elaborate as the concerto affords but little chance to judge satisfactorily of the work and to do justice to the merits of a composer who has proved that a woman can write music worthy of critical consideration. Mrs Beach has always aimed high and there is nothing in her writings which pertains to the frivolous. Her songs and her more pretentious sonatas and "Gaelic" symphony are familiar to concertgoers, and each composition has shown praiseworthy results. Probably she is the only woman composer in this country deserving of more than passing notice, for she has been at all times earnest, serious and thorough, and the orchestrations of her works are her own and not the productions of others. In her concerto she has used a great deal of thematic material and the piano is largely in evidence, not always as a solo instrument, but as a part of orchestra; at least that was the impression gained from yesterday's performance.

The first movement is worked out logically, though seemingly not very clear in some of the theme developments, and there is an unaccompanied cadenza which is quite brilliant in construction. In the second and third parts the piano portion is very elaborate, alternating with the orchestra through nearly all the second movement. The third and fourth movements are not divided, the latter opening with a lively introduction on the pianoforte which is soon followed by a second cadenza, unaccompanied, and closing with a vigorous finale. Mrs Beach uses many cross harmonies, and her concerto is modern in every way. Her piano work was excellent and, of course, sympathetic, but she, like nearly all of her sex, lacked the power of coping with an orchestra like the Boston symphony, especially where so many fortissimo passages occur, and the consequence was an obscuration of some of the piano score. The audience received Mrs Beach with cordiality, and recalled her several times at the close of the concerto.

The orchestra played in its usual effective manner. The old-fashioned ballet suite by Rameau, calling for precise accentuation of rhythm, was given with commendable vigor, and the "Sappho" overture was interpreted satisfactorily.

The Borodin symphony, not specially interesting as a whole, calls for no extended praise aside from commendation for a conscientious and even performance of the work in its entirety.

The program for this week's concerts will comprise Haydn's "Military" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Brahm's first symphony.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 7, 1900.

The symphony concert management can hardly overlook the plea for a 2 p.m. beginning of the Friday rehearsals for the 1900-1901 season when it comes as it does from a lady whose symphony-going record is 19 years, and a trip of 80 miles on the cars for every concert.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 98.
SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Goldmark Overture, with Its Orchestral Richness, Heard.

Masterly Reading by Mr. Gericke of the Borodin Symphony—Mrs. Beach's Concerto Another Feature—Acquitted Herself Brilliantly in the Piano Part.

The 21st of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, was given last evening, with this programme:

Overture, "Sappho"……………….Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte in C sharp minor.
Mrs. H. H. A. Beach
Ballet suite……………………….Rameau
(Edited by Felix Mottl.)
Symphony No. 1, in E flat…………..Borodin

The soloist was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

The Goldmark overture is a noble work, with great splendor of orchestral richness of effect, virile dramatic passion and beauty of themes, but it is constantly suggestive of its composer's finer and more familiar overture to "Sakuntala," especially in its sensuous color and the close resemblance of its second subject and its development. There are also moments which seem to be identical in both overtures. This does not detract from its worth, and if a composer plagiarizes from himself he is scarcely open to reproach. In any case, the work is immensely inspiring and effective, and the impressive reading and performance accorded it did full justice to its lofty dignity.

The Rameau suite, which was one of the novelties of the programme, consists of a minuet from "Platee," a musette from "Les Fetes d'Hebe," and a tambourin, from the same work, put together by Felix Mottl, whose editing doubtless included touching up the score. This latter service has been done with infinite taste and judgment, and without overmodernizing the original effect. The music is piquantly quaint in its pretty tunefulness, and very pleasing in the hearing. The last movement is something better than this in its vigor and its development. The suite was delightfully and sympathetically performed, the musette in particular being interpreted with charming grace.

The Borodin symphony is a strong and interesting work, with a marked original individuality, always solid and often brilliant in its orchestration. The scherzo and the finale are the most attractive movements, though the latter is overlong for what it has to say; but the winding up is tremendously impassioned and stirring. It is a notable example of the modern Russian school, but it is lacking in the melodiousness, the freedom and the largeness that are so conspicuous in the symphonies of Tschaikowsky. Mr. Gericke gave a masterly reading of the work, and the orchestra was at its very best in the performance of it.

Mrs. Beach's concerto was the other novelty of the evening. It is not easy to understand on a single hearing. Under these conditions it seemed to be weak in ideas, and, on the whole, crabbed and uninteresting. There is but little of flowing melody in it, with scarcely a moment of reposeful cantilena, the solo part being, for the most part, little else than difficult, and not always clear passage work.

The orchestration is steadily thick and noisy, and too frequently so massive that the solo instrument does not and cannot loom through it. The score would benefit greatly by a severe thinning out. As it is, the concerto is monotonously void of contrasts. There are fire enough and passion enough in the work, but they did not appear to lead to anything that was coherent or comprehensible. Singularly enough here was a piano concerto in which the orchestra dominated everything. Nor was it the fault of the players that the solo instrument was overwhelmed. The fault was in the remorseless heaviness of the instrumentation, that no skill or care on the part of conductor and orchestra could have modified effectually to the full advantage of the soloist.

Mrs. Beach had set herself an exacting task in the piano part, but she acquitted herself of it brilliantly, and with an affluence of fine technique. It is to be regretted that she had not afforded herself opportunities to exemplify her skill in the finer and more delicate and expressive qualities of her art. The performance was greeted with great enthusiasm, and she received three or four stormy recalls. The programme for the next concert is: "Military," symphony, Haydn; prelude to "Parsifal," Wagner, and symphony No. 1, in C minor, Brahms.

[illegible] ADVERTISER

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1900.

Symphony Concert — Mrs. Beach's Piano Concerto.

"Sappho" was given by the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday! This statement need not shock conservative Bostonians, for there was nothing in the performance that could bring a blush to the cheek of modesty. While New York revels in Daudet's "Sappho" and the fervid Nethersole, Boston contents itself with a musical "Sappho" a la Goldmark and without any stairway scene. It is a subject which is quite in Goldmark's sensuous vein, and he has portrayed the amatory Aeolian poetess with a due amount of tenderness. All Bostonians have affection for Sappho, for was she not the president of the first woman's club on record, the literary society at Mytilene? And did she not royally scold her brother Charaxus when that gentleman wanted to introduce the rather shady Rhodop's into their set"!

The overture is especially attractive in obbligato effects; the opening rhapsody for harp was exquisitely played by Mr. Schuecker, who had, for once, the lion's share of the work, and the obbligato for violin was also very beautiful as played by Mr. Kneisel. The usual Goldmarkian woodwind effects were prominent, a world of sighs.

This overture, portraying a very poetic and learned lady, was a very fitting introduction of the next number of the programme, Mrs. Beach's piano concerto, played by the composer herself. Boston is evidently proud of Mrs. Beach, and her welcome was a very decided one. This lady has no desire to shine in the smaller forms of music, but constantly essays the highest flights; she has composed some excellent songs and piano works, but her vaulting ambition has recently led her to create a large mass, a long symphony, and now a four-movement piano concerto. In the last composition she is in her own peculiar field, for she is a pianist of high ability; one therefore expected a work in which the solo instrument should dominate the orchestra, for this has been the weakness of all great pianists who have produced piano concertos; Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt, all put their especial instrument too much in the foreground when combining it with the orchestra.

It was a surprise, therefore, to find the fault of the concerto to be in exactly the opposite direction; the orchestration swallows up the piano in many passages, and the solo instrument is not employed in sounding forth bold themes in its own definite style, but in giving constant fioriture, scales and ornate passages, against rather vague themes in the orchestra. Only in the cadenza of the first movement did the piano assume individual prominence, but here Mrs. Beach gave a great amount of virtuosity and proved her technique as brilliant as ever.

The whole first movement seemed rather indefinite, at a first hearing; although there were many individual passages of much charm, there did not seem to be that coherency and clear scheme which one finds in the masterpieces; it was a case of the dove soaring with the eagles.

To follow Brahms' lead, and give four movements to a concerto, was rather a risky proceeding, but the scherzo was very brief and presented such pretty filagree work on the solo instrument (and this dainty embroidery of tones fitted the Steinertone like a glove) that one readily condoned its interpolation. Again we wished for a lighter orchestral scoring to balance against the delicate solo work.

The largo, although given on the house-programme as combined with the finale, was in reality a movement of itself. It treated a figure which reminded of the fate-figure in Wagner's trilogy (Cesar Franck has also developed this figure in his D minor symphony) and indicated a pensive melancholy.

The finale seemed to us the best, most decisive and most original movement of the work. There were some phrases given in this that seemed to be in the vein of Dvorak's "American Symphony," although not suggesting plagiarism in the remotest degree. The entire movement was interesting and had many bold and striking contrasts.

It is unnecessary to speak of Mrs. Beach's performance of her own work; her technique was adequate to every demand made upon it. It was no slight matter to appear in a piano work on the same day that a prince of technique had electrified Boston, but even the great piano recital of the afternoon did not seem to dwarf Mrs. Beach's playing. The public were in the friendliest mood and recalled the composer-pianist four times and also added floral tributes.

A ballet-suite by Rameau, arranged by Mottl, came next. Rameau was the gentleman who wrote, somewhere about 1720, the plaintive statement that Music had said about all that it had to say, and that the Art was moribund and would soon die of inanition and necessary repetitions! A few composers named Bach, Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Chopin, Schumann, Wagner, etc., etc., whose important works came later, seem to take away the gravity of this statement. The suite was in every way delightful; just the proper compromise between classical and popular music. It was all dainty in a superlative degree and contained especial work for oboe and bassoon, both favorite obbligato instruments in the last century. Especially exquisite were the canonic touches between flute, violin and bassoon in the final "Tambourin."

Borodin's symphony, which closed the concert, is music for musicians rather than for the public; it is the most Russian of Caviar to the general. The first movement mixed the various keys in an enharmonic salad that was not altogether palatable. It had some inexplicable dissonances. But, after all, no composer need attempt to justify his dissonances or his progressions nowadays; anything goes, maugre Richter, Jadassohn and other musical obstructionists. [illegible] not exactly playful. [illegible] agined as [illegible] tarantella be the result. Of course the semi-savage dalliance with rhythms needed to occur, and a trio which drove even and triple rhythms in double harness followed.

In the third movement (Andante) the Russian was scratched and the Tartar was discovered; an Asiatic, oboe melody, seemed to suggest Grief combined with Catarrh, and even the final cadence of kettle-drums, dominant and tonic, was ingeniously developed.

This was perhaps the chief fault of the symphony, the demon of development had strangled melody in its cradle; every innocent little figure became the basis of profound displays of transformation, a development that could only appeal to the musician, and to him only from the intellectual side: the finale was full to the brim of such figure treatment.

Now as Mrs. Beach's concerto had given little melody, and Borodin's symphony gave even less (except in its Andante), that old-fashioned adjunct of music which is called "tune" was conspicuous by its absence, at this concert.

Louis C. Elson.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the last symphony rehearsal and concert was:

Overture, "Sapho," op. 44....Goldmark.
Concerto for pianoforte, C sharp minor, op. 45.........Mrs. H. Beach.
Ballet suite..................Rameau-Mottl.
Symphony No. 1, E flat major..Borodin.

The novelty of the programme was the concerto by Mrs. Beach and it may be said at once that it is fully equal to anything she has written. It is a most carefully considered and carefully wrought out work and it reveals the diligent student on every page. Unfortunately the diligent student is more in evidence than the inspired genius, the work is lacking in spontaniety; the ideas are not of the largest kind, and they are drawn out too thin and repeated to the point of monotony. There is no indication that the work was born of irresistible impulse; there is indication of slow, emotionless deliberation. The current is never rapid, never deep, never irresistible; the changes are surface changes, wind-puffs and pebble vibrations. As the composer did not feel deeply she does not deeply move her audience, and one is nver allowed to forget the composer in the work composed; there is no chance of saying "how noble and overpowering this or that movement is," but there are many chances of saying "how self-consciously clever the composer is." In a word the work is not a masterpiece; gives no hint at inspiration, deep feeling or large invention and has not the overwhelming force, the convincing power that masterpieces produce.

On the other hand, it is a clever work; it is modern in spirit, it is full of striking passages and bold and effective modulations, and the technical knowledge everywhere displayed is of a high and sometimes of a daring character. The instruments, however, are not combined in the most effective manner, the mixture is not clear, but muddy. With the piano Mrs. Beach always attains the color and effect she desires: the orchestra is less obedient in her hands; she uses it in one way and the result is monotonous. The most brilliant portion of the work, at first hearing, is the last movement; the least effective and the most forced is the adagio for the production of which cleverness and book knowledge are not sufficient; the scherzo is bright and spirited; the theme of the first movement seems to be lacking in originality. Mrs. Beach has given better examples of her talents than this concerto, though it may be that a second and third hearing might call for a reversal of this judgment. The piano part is very difficult, but it was played by Mrs. Beach with graceful ease, effectiveness and brilliancy. Judging from the applause the work won the approval of the large audience present to hear it.

The instrument used was called a "Steinert one," though so far as the hearer was concerned, it seemingly differed in no discernable manner from the average piano.

The programme for the next concert is Symphony No. 11, G minor, Haydn; Prelude to "Parsifal," Wagner; Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 7, 1900.

THE KNEISEL—THE SYMPHONY—NEW WORKS BY MRS. BEACH AND DOHNANYI—THE HEINRICHS, ETC.

The twenty-first Symphony programme gave ample opportunity for the listener to exercise his attention to the full; for although only two of its four numbers were absolutely new, the rest was unfamiliar, consisting of Goldmark's sensuously poetic and picturesque rather than dramatic "Sapho" overture and the Russian Borodin's first symphony, so characteristic in themes and treatment of his race and of him. The lighter of the novelties was a suite arranged by that skilful master of orchestration, Mottl, from the dainty, graceful and light-stepping ballet music of Rameau, while the more important was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's new pianoforte concerto in C-sharp minor, opus 45, dedicated to Mme. Teresa Carreno. This composition displays in dignified, scholarly impressive and gratifying ways that advance upon herself and that perfecting in art of which Mrs. Beach's later writings have given proof. As with Professor Paine, so with her,—each new year sees a fresher, richer and more spontaneous melody, alike in the simple salon songs and in works for the chamber, or the orchestral musician, while the variety, surety and strength of the instrumentation develop logically and agreeably, as was felt when her "Scotch" symphony was presented. The concerto begins allegro with the announcement of the primary theme by the orchestra, after which the solo instrument makes a brilliant entrance, responding and leading up to a quieter presentment of the subject. Hence the usual forms of evolution and combination are followed, a second theme of more expressive character being introduced, as well as a cantabile passage for solo first violin (rendered delightfully of course by Mr. Kneisel) until after some changes in tempo and an episode in the key of E flat, the movement comes to a brilliant and powerful conclusion. The second movement, in A major, is a scherzo, cast in the form of a "perpetuum mobile," the opening of which is led in by the cellos and violas and which grows in animation as it proceeds, although it ends lightly with long trills and chromatic runs for the piano. The third movement begins with a calm and almost melancholy largo, also in A, but soon resumes the original key and accelerates its pace to an allegro con scioltezza, which gives great scope for display in both the solo and orchestral scores and provides for some effective and brilliant cadenzas.

The fine Steinertone with Mrs. Beach's exquisite touch upon the keys, brought out a wonderful depth of tone, and responded to her call, whether for dreamy softness, sparkling vivacity, or broad maestroso effects. Her reading of the part was delightful, so sincerely earnest and unaffected, yet so instinct with feeling and intelligence. The orchestral portion was grandly giveu, and the pleasure and appreciation of the audience was evidenced by the repeated recalls of the composer.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1900.

Mr. W. I. Henderson, in the course of his comments on Schuch, compliments the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"What was gained for the art of music by bringing Mr. von Schuch here? It was a very good advertisement for Mr. von Schuch and if Mr. Grau intends to engage him as opera conductor for next season it was a fine and expensive method of introducing him to the public. But what good did it do? What did it prove? To how many persons in the audience did the familiar overtures to 'Der Freischütz,' 'Oberon,' and 'Euryanthe' sound otherwise than they had in days gone by? A few musical connoisseurs, and perhaps some of the newspaper writers, may have discovered some changes from the conventional treatment, and perhaps the orchestra, under the stimulus of a new personality, played with more spirit than usual. But was Mr. von Schuch able to transform the Metropolitan Opera House into the Boston Symphony Orchestra? It will generally be conceded that he did not, in spite of the grave assertion contained some time ago in one of our morning contemporaries that he could in one hour so completely master any orchestra as to make it play precisely as he desired it to. Mr. von Schuch attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one week ago Thursday, and there is no doubt that he wished from the bottom of his soul that he could make the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra play like the men from the New England metropolis; but his hypnotic powers failed at the vital moment.

"Mr. von Schuch is credited by those who are acquainted with his work in Dresden with being a thoroughly competent operatic conductor in the circumstances which surround him at home. These embrace a permanent institution in which rehearsals are plentiful and his authority firmly established. There was no reason to suppose that he could come here, and, with an orchestra new to him, produce the effects which he produces at home. Nor was there any reason why the public should be expected to betray a devouring curiosity at to what he might do with his readings. Conductor worship has reached a pretty high state of development in this community, but it has not gone so far that the general public will rush to hear how a new man will read old works like the three Weber overtures with which Mr. von Schuch elected to begin his concert. And, as for music itself, it cannot be said that it reaped any immediate or lasting benefit from this recent importation. Bring Mr. von Schuch to America to stay, give him a good, permanent orchestra, or make him the conductor of the German works at the Metropolitan Opera House, and we shall be able to tell whether he is to confer any lasting benefit on music in this land. Bring him here to conduct two or three occasional concerts with an orchestra which never saw him before, and he becomes a mere sensation of the hour without a single artistic reason for his presence."

Philip Hale.

[illegible]

MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-first Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was:

Goldmark: Overture, "Sappho," opus 44.
Mrs. H. H. A. Beach: Concerto for Pianoforte, in C-sharp minor, opus 45 (MS., first time).
Rameau: Ballet Suite (freely arranged by Felix Mottl) (first time in Boston).
Borodin: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major.
Mrs. H. H. A Beach was the pianist.

The Goldmark overture was grandly played. The work itself would produce a stronger impression, were it not modelled so nearly exactly on the plan of the "Sakuntala;" there are even some similarities of theme that recall the earlier overture. And the comparison is not in favor of the "Sappho." One almost wishes that Goldmark had not written it, and had left the "Sakuntala" as something wholly unique and sui generis. There is, however, no little beauty in the "Sappho," a certain grandiosity at moments which, to be sure, is not true grandeur, but is very gorgeous and magnificent.

The Rameau suite, deliciously orchestrated by Mottl, is a gem. What a courtly elegance of simplicity there is in the opening minuet! That is music for gallant courtiers and high dames to dance to. The musette is very lovely, too, and the final tambourin, full of the quaintest piquant humor. The whole thing is full of genius. By the way, when will German composers and arrangers find out that a tambourin is not a tambourine? The final "e" makes a good deal of difference.

The Borodin symphony can hardly be called a great work. But there is genius in it, it is all of a piece, it has style. I must say that I get more satisfaction out of the neck-or-nothing Russians, like Borodin and Rimski-Korsakoff, than I do out of Tchaikovsky. That he, as a man of genius, as an artistic temperament, overtops them both makes no difference; Borodin and Rimski-Korsakoff are no giants; but they have more unity than he, more individuality of style. In this symphony of Borodin's you have the Asiatic Russian, and nothing but the Asiatic Russian. You may at times feel the influence of Berlioz; but, Frenchman to the finger-tips though Berlioz was, there was nothing specifically French in the musical influence he exerted; a German might show the effects of it, while losing nothing of his Teutonism, and a Russian, without giving up one jot of his Slavism. It was purely individual and "modern," with no distinctively national elements in it. We have heard better things in Boston than this symphony, but it was well worth giving; Borodin had something of his own to say, and has said it unmistakably.

Mrs. Beach's new concerto is a work to give one pause. I have now heard it, or nearly the whole of it, twice—at a private rehearsal and at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon (for it was to this that I went, instead of to the Saturday evening concert)—besides going through the pianoforte score. It is a great pity that a composer of very distinct talent, like Mrs. Beach, should undertake nothing but such extended works for orchestra; that, instead of writing one huge symphony and one quite as huge concerto, she has not written half a dozen concert overtures, short symphonic poems or other works of more modest dimensions. Mrs. Beach seems to me to stand in the by no means common position of laboring under an over-wealth of ideas; she is immensely susceptible to suggestion, a theme nearly always suggests to her a counter-theme; she is seldom doing less than two things at once, often she does three. Her scores are wondrously rich in material. Now, to carry out this heavily laden style of orchestral writing successfully, a positively enormous skill in orchestration is necessary. What Mrs. Beach most needs is experience in listening to her own works; and while occasionally producing compositions of such extravagant dimensions, instead of frequently producing shorter things, she has too little opportunity to gain this experience. She has thus remained longer at the tentative stage than she ought; she ought by this time to have acquired more maturity of conception, a more trustworthy skill in execution. She still retains something of that characteristic trait of the beginner, a tendency to put all her eggs in one basket, to do all she can at once. In this concerto, for instance, she has done pretty nearly everything that possibly can be done with pianoforte and orchestra; there is material—essential and ornamental—enough in it to make two concertos. It is all overloaded with figural ornamentation and contrapuntal cleverness. To make some of her combinations effective and clear would take the skill of a Richard Strauss; time and again you do not hear what you see plainly before you on the page; theme and counter-theme mutually drown each other out, and all you plainly hear is an accompanying horn-phrase, really of less importance than either. No doubt there is much beauty in the work, no little genuineness of feeling, a considerable fertility of invention. But there is too much going on at the same time; that is, too much until the work has been so rescored as to make its complexity intelligible to the ear. For one thing, however, she plays it wonderfully, with consummate technique and great beauty of expression. She was enthusiastically received, as well she deserved to be.

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in G major, "Military" (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 11; Peters, No. 7); Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.

W. F. A.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1900.

Symphony Concert — Mrs. Beach's Piano Concerto.

"Sappho" was given by the Symphony Orchestra last Saturday! This statement need not shock conservative Bostonians, for there was nothing in the performance that could bring a blush to the cheek of modesty. While New York revels in Daudet's "Sappho" and the fervid Nethersole, Boston contents itself with a musical "Sappho" a la Goldmark and without any stairway scene. It is a subject which is quite in Goldmark's sensuous vein, and he has portrayed the amatory Aeolian poetess with a due amount of tenderness. All Bostonians have affection for Sappho, for was she not the president of the first woman's club on record, the literary society at Mytilene? And did she not royally scold her brother Charaxus when that gentleman wanted to introduce the rather shady Rhodop's into their set"!

The overture is especially attractive in obbligato effects; the opening rhapsody for harp was exquisitely played by Mr. Schuecker, who had, for once, the lion's share of the work, and the obbligato for violin was also very beautiful as played by Mr. Kneisel. The usual Goldmarkian woodwind effects were prominent, a world of sighs.

This overture, portraying a very poetic and learned lady, was a very fitting introduction of the next number of the programme, Mrs. Beach's piano concerto, played by the composer herself. Boston is evidently proud of Mrs. Beach, and her welcome was a very decided one. This lady has no desire to shine in the smaller forms of music, but constantly essays the highest flights; she has composed some excellent songs and piano works, but her vaulting ambition has recently led her to create a large mass, a long symphony, and now a four-movement piano concerto. In the last composition she is in her own peculiar field, for she is a pianist of high ability; one therefore expected a work in which the solo instrument should dominate the orchestra, for this has been the weakness of all great pianists who have produced piano concertos; Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt, all put their especial instrument too much in the foreground when combining it with the orchestra.

It was a surprise, therefore, to find the fault of the concerto to be in exactly the opposite direction; the orchestration swallows up the piano in many passages, and the solo instrument is not employed in sounding forth bold themes in its own definite style, but in giving constant fioriture, scales and ornate passages, against rather vague themes in the orchestra. Only in the cadenza of the first movement did the piano assume individual prominence, but here Mrs. Beach gave a great amount of virtuosity and proved her technique as brilliant as ever.

The whole first movement seemed rather indefinite, at a first hearing; although there were many individual passages of much charm, there did not seem to be that coherency and clear scheme which one finds in the masterpieces; it was a case of the dove soaring with the eagles.

To follow Brahms' lead, and give four movements to a concerto, was rather a risky proceeding, but the scherzo was very brief and presented such pretty filagree work on the solo instrument (and this dainty embroidery of tones fitted the Steinertone like a glove) that one readily condoned its interpolation. Again we wished for a lighter orchestral scoring to balance against the delicate solo work.

The largo, although given on the house-programme as combined with the finale, was in reality a movement of itself. It treated a figure which reminded of the fate-figure in Wagner's trilogy (Cesar Franck has also developed this figure in his D minor symphony) and indicated a pensive melancholy.

The finale seemed to us the best, most decisive and most original movement of the work. There were some phrases given in this that seemed to be in the vein of Dvorak's "American Symphony," although not suggesting plagiarism in the remotest degree. The entire movement was interesting and had many bold and striking contrasts.

It is unnecessary to speak of Mrs. Beach's performance of her own work; her technique was adequate to every demand made upon it. It was no slight matter to appear in a piano work on the same day that a prince of technique had electrified Boston, but even the great piano recital of the afternoon did not seem to dwarf Mrs. Beach's playing. The public were in the friendliest mood and recalled the composer-pianist four times and also added floral tributes.

A ballet-suite by Rameau, arranged by Mottl, came next. Rameau was the gentleman who wrote, somewhere about 1720, the plaintive statement that Music had said about all that it had to say, and that the Art was moribund and would soon die of inanition and necessary repetitions! A few composers named Bach, Handel, Mozart, Haydn, Chopin, Schumann, Wagner, etc., etc., whose important works came later, seem to take away the gravity of this statement. The suite was in every way delightful; just the proper compromise between classical and popular music. It was all dainty in a superlative degree and contained especial work for oboe and bassoon, both favorite obbligato instruments in the last century. Especially exquisite were the canonic touches between flute, violin and bassoon in the final "Tambourin."

Borodin's symphony, which closed the concert, is music for musicians rather than for the public; it is the most Russian of Caviar to the general. The first movement mixed the various keys in an enharmonic salad that was not altogether palatable. It had some inexplicable dissonances. But, after all, no composer need attempt to justify his dissonances or his progressions nowadays; everything goes, maugre Richter, Jadassohn and other musical obstructionists. The scherzo was not exactly playful, [illegible] agined as [illegible] tarantella be the result. Of course the semi-savage dalliance with rhythms needed to occur, and a trio which drove even and triple rhythms in double harness followed.

In the third movement (Andante) the Russian was scratched and the Tartar was discovered; an Asiatic, oboe melody, seemed to suggest Grief combined with Catarrh, and even the final cadence of kettle-drums, dominant and tonic, was ingeniously developed.

This was perhaps the chief fault of the symphony, the demon of development had strangled melody in its cradle; every innocent little figure became the basis of profound displays of transformation, a development that could only appeal to the musician, and to him only from the intellectual side: the finale was full to the brim of such figure treatment.

Now as Mrs. Beach's concerto had given little melody, and Borodin's symphony gave even less (except in its Andante), that old-fashioned adjunct of music which is called "tune" was conspicuous by its absence, at this concert.

Louis C. Elson.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the last symphony rehearsal and concert was:

Overture, "Sapho," op. 44....Goldmark.
Concerto for pianoforte, C sharp minor, op. 45.........Mrs. H. Beach.
Ballet suite...............Rameau-Mottl.
Symphony No. 1, E flat major..Borodin.

The novelty of the programme was the concerto by Mrs. Beach and it may be said at once that it is fully equal to anything she has written. It is a most carefully considered and carefully wrought out work and it reveals the diligent student on every page. Unfortunately the diligent student is more in evidence than the inspired genius, the work is lacking in spontaniety; the ideas are not of the largest kind, and they are drawn out too thin and repeated to the point of monotony. There is no indication that the work was born of irresistible impulse; there is indication of slow, emotionless deliberation. The current is never rapid, never deep, never irresistible; the changes are surface changes, wind-puffs and pebble vibrations. As the composer did not feel deeply she does not deeply move her audience, and one is nver allowed to forget the composer in the work composed; there is no chance of saying "how noble and overpowering this or that movement is," but there are many chances of saying "how self-consciously clever the composer is." In a word the work is not a masterpiece; gives no hint at inspiration, deep feeling or large invention and has not the overwhelming force, the convincing power that masterpieces produce.

On the other hand, it is a clever work; it is modern in spirit, it is full of striking passages and bold and effective modulations, and the technical knowledge everywhere displayed is of a high and sometimes of a daring character. The instruments, however, are not combined in the most effective manner, the mixture is not clear, but muddy. With the piano Mrs. Beach always attains the color and effect she desires; the orchestra is less obedient in her hands; she uses it in one way and the result is monotonous. The most brilliant portion of the work, at first hearing, is the last movement; the least effective and the most forced is the adagio for the production of which cleverness and book knowledge are not sufficient; the scherzo is bright and spirited; the theme of the first movement seems to be lacking in originality. Mrs. Beach has given better examples of her talents than this concerto, though it may be that a second and third hearing might call for a reversal of this judgment. The piano part is very difficult, but it was played by Mrs. Beach with graceful ease, effectiveness and brilliancy. Judging from the applause the work won the approval of the large audience present to hear it.

The instrument used was called a "Steinert one," though so far as the hearer was concerned, it seemingly differed in no discernable manner from the average piano.

The programme for the next concert is Symphony No. 11, G minor, Haydn; Prelude to "Parsifal," Wagner; Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 7, 1900.

THE KNEISEL—THE SYMPHONY—NEW WORKS BY MRS. BEACH AND DOHNANYI—THE HEINRICHS, ETC.

The twenty-first Symphony programme gave ample opportunity for the listener to exercise his attention to the full; for although only two of its four numbers were absolutely new, the rest was unfamiliar, consisting of Goldmark's sensuously poetic and picturesque rather than dramatic "Sapho" overture and the Russian Borodin's first symphony, so characteristic in themes and treatment of his race and of him. The lighter of the novelties was a suite arranged by that skilful master of orchestration, Mottl, from the dainty, graceful and light-stepping ballet music of Rameau, while the more important was Mrs. H. H. A. Beach's new pianoforte concerto in C-sharp minor, opus 45, dedicated to Mme. Teresa Carreno. This composition displays in dignified, scholarly impressive and gratifying ways that advance upon herself and that perfecting in art of which Mrs. Beach's later writings have given proof. As with Professor Paine, so with her,—each new year sees a fresher, richer and more spontaneous melody, alike in the simple salon songs and in works for the chamber, or the orchestral musician, while the variety, surety and strength of the instrumentation develop logically and agreeably, as was felt when her "Scotch" symphony was presented. The concerto begins allegro with the announcement of the primary theme by the orchestra, after which the solo instrument makes a brilliant entrance, responding and leading up to a quieter presentment of the subject. Hence the usual forms of evolution and combination are followed, a second theme of more expressive character being introduced, as well as a cantabile passage for solo first violin (rendered delightfully of course by Mr. Kneisel) until after some changes in tempo and an episode in the key of E flat, the movement comes to a brilliant and powerful conclusion. The second movement, in A major, is a scherzo, cast in the form of a "perpetuum mobile," the opening of which is led in by the cellos and violas and which grows in animation as it proceeds, although it ends lightly with long trills and chromatic runs for the piano. The third movement begins with a calm and almost melancholy largo, also in A, but soon resumes the original key and accelerates its pace to an allegro con scioltezza, which gives great scope for display in both the solo and orchestral scores and provides for some effective and brilliant cadenzas.

The fine Steinertone with Mrs. Beach's exquisite touch upon the keys, brought out a wonderful depth of tone, and responded to her call, whether for dreamy softness, sparkling vivacity, or broad maestroso effects. Her reading of the part was delightful, so sincerely earnest and unaffected, yet so instinct with feeling and intelligence. The orchestral portion was grandly given, and the pleasure and appreciation of the audience was evidenced by the repeated recalls of the composer.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 8, 1900.

Mr. W. I. Henderson, in the course of his comments on Schuch, compliments the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

"What was gained for the art of music by bringing Mr. von Schuch here? It was a very good advertisement for Mr. von Schuch and if Mr. Grau intends to engage him as opera conductor for next season it was a fine and expensive method of introducing him to the public. But what good did it do? What did it prove? To how many persons in the audience did the familiar overtures to 'Der Freischütz,' 'Oberon,' and 'Euryanthe' sound otherwise than they had in days gone by? A few musical connoisseurs, and perhaps some of the newspaper writers, may have discovered some changes from the conventional treatment, and perhaps the orchestra, under the stimulus of a new personality, played with more spirit than usual. But was Mr. von Schuch able to transform the Metropolitan Opera House into the Boston Symphony Orchestra? It will generally be conceded that he did not, in spite of the grave assertion contained some time ago in one of our morning contemporaries that he could in one hour so completely master any orchestra as to make it play precisely as he desired it to. Mr. von Schuch attended the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra one week ago Thursday, and there is no doubt that he wished from the bottom of his soul that he could make the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra play like the men from the New England metropolis; but his hypnotic powers failed at the vital moment.

"Mr. von Schuch is credited by those who are acquainted with his work in Dresden with being a thoroughly competent operatic conductor in the circumstances which surround him at home. These embrace a permanent institution in which rehearsals are plentiful and his authority firmly established. There was no reason to suppose that he could come here, and, with an orchestra new to him, produce the effects which he produces at home. Nor was there any reason why the public should be expected to betray a devouring curiosity at to what he might do with his readings. Conductor worship has reached a pretty high state of development in this community, but it has not gone so far that the general public will rush to hear how a new man will read old works like the three Weber overtures with which Mr. von Schuch elected to begin his concert. And, as for music itself, it cannot be said that it reaped any immediate or lasting benefit from this recent importation. Bring Mr. von Schuch to America to stay, give him a good, permanent orchestra, or make him the conductor of the German works at the Metropolitan Opera House, and we shall be able to tell whether he is to confer any lasting benefit on music in this land. Bring him here to conduct two or three occasional concerts with an orchestra which never saw him before, and he becomes a mere sensation of the hour without a single artistic reason for his presence."

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 9, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-first Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was:

Goldmark: Overture, "Sappho," opus 44.
Mrs. H. H. A. Beach: Concerto for Pianoforte, in C-sharp minor, opus 45 (MS., first time).
Rameau: Ballet Suite (freely arranged by Felix Mottl) (first time in Boston).
Borodin: Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major.
Mrs. H. H. A Beach was the pianist.

The Goldmark overture was grandly played. The work itself would produce a stronger impression, were it not modelled so nearly exactly on the plan of the "Sakuntala;" there are even some similarities of theme that recall the earlier overture. And the comparison is not in favor of the "Sappho." One almost wishes that Goldmark had not written it, and had left the "Sakuntala" as something wholly unique and sui generis. There is, however, no little beauty in the "Sappho," a certain grandiosity at moments which, to be sure, is not true grandeur, but is very gorgeous and magnificent.

The Rameau suite, deliciously orchestrated by Mottl, is a gem. What a courtly elegance of simplicity there is in the opening minuet! That is music for gallant courtiers and high dames to dance to. The musette is very lovely, too, and the final tambourin, full of the quaintest piquant humor. The whole thing is full of genius. By the way, when will German composers and arrangers find out that a tambourin is not a tambourine? The final "e" makes a good deal of difference.

The Borodin symphony can hardly be called a great work. But there is genius in it, it is all of a piece, it has style. I must say that I get more satisfaction out of the neck-or-nothing Russians, like Borodin and Rimski-Korsakoff, than I do out of Tchaikovsky. That he, as a man of genius, as an artistic temperament, overtops them both makes no difference; Borodin and Rimski-Korsakoff are no giants, but they have more unity than he, more individuality of style. In this symphony of Borodin's you have the Asiatic Russian, and nothing but the Asiatic Russian. You may at times feel the influence of Berlioz; but, Frenchman to the finger-tips though Berlioz was, there was nothing specifically French in the musical influence he exerted; a German might show the effects of it, while losing nothing of his Teutonism, and a Russian, without giving up one jot of his Slavism. It was purely individual and "modern," with no distinctively national elements in it. We have heard better things in Boston than this symphony, but it was well worth giving; Borodin had something of his own to say, and has said it unmistakably.

Mrs. Beach's new concerto is a work to give one pause. I have now heard it, or nearly the whole of it, twice—at a private rehearsal and at the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon (for it was to this that I went, instead of to the Saturday evening concert)—besides going through the pianoforte score. It is a great pity that a composer of very distinct talent, like Mrs. Beach, should undertake nothing but such extended works for orchestra; that, instead of writing one huge symphony and one quite as huge concerto, she has not written half a dozen concert overtures, short symphonic poems or other works of more modest dimensions. Mrs. Beach seems to me to stand in the by no means common position of laboring under an over-wealth of ideas; she is immensely susceptible to suggestion, a theme nearly always suggests to her a counter-theme; she is seldom doing less than two things at once, often she does three. Her scores are wondrously rich in material. Now, to carry out this heavily laden style of orchestral writing successfully, a positively enormous skill in orchestration is necessary. What Mrs. Beach most needs is experience in listening to her own works; and while occasionally producing compositions of such extravagant dimensions, instead of frequently producing shorter things, she has too little opportunity to gain this experience. She has thus remained longer at the tentative stage than she ought; she ought by this time to have acquired more maturity of conception, a more trustworthy skill in execution. She still retains something of that characteristic trait of the beginner, a tendency to put all her eggs in one basket, to do all she can at once. In this concerto, for instance, she has done pretty nearly everything that possibly can be done with pianoforte and orchestra; there is material—essential and ornamental—enough in it to make two concertos. It is all overloaded with figural ornamentation and contrapuntal cleverness. To make some of her combinations effective and clear would take the skill of a Richard Strauss; time and again you do not hear what you see plainly before you on the page; theme and counter-theme mutually drown each other out, and all you plainly hear is an accompanying horn-phrase, really of less importance than either. No doubt there is much beauty in the work, no little genuineness of feeling, a considerable fertility of invention. But there is too much going on at the same time; that is, too much until the work has been so rescored as to make its complexity intelligible to the ear. For one thing, however, she plays it wonderfully, with consummate technique and great beauty of expression. She was enthusiastically received, as well she deserved to be.

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in G major, "Military" (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 11; Peters, No. 7); Wagner, prelude to "Parsifal"; Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.

W. F. A.

[illegible] APRIL 11, 1900.

[illegible]MONY CONCERT.

[illegible] Performance of a Fresh [illegible] Interesting Programme.

The seventh concert of the Symphony series was given in Infantry Hall last evening before an appreciative audience. The programme was made up of novelties, or what might be termed such, as one of the four numbers was absolutely new, and the others, though they have been played at some time in other concerts, were unfamiliar to a considerable extent. The list was as follows:

Overture, "Sappho," op. 44....Karl Goldmark
Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, in D minor, op. 21............Edouard Lalo
I. Allegro non troppo (D minor).
II. Scherzando: Allegro molto (G major).
III. Andante (D minor).
IV. Dondo: Allegro (D major.)
Ballet-music from the opera "Azara;" three Moorish dances....John Knowles Paine
(First time.)
I. Allegretto animato (G minor).
II. Poco meno mosso (G major).
III. Introduction: Allegretto quasi Andante. Allegretto con moto e grazioso (A major).
Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93 ....Ludwig van Beethoven
I. Allegro vivace e con brio (F major).
II. Allegretto scherzando (B-flat major).
III. Tempo di menuetto (F major).
IV. Allegro vivace (F major).

Goldmark's enormously brilliant overture was played with the greatest spirit and received hearty applause. This is a comparatively new work, having been composed but a half-dozen years ago, and is quite up to the level of Goldmark's previous offerings in its gorgeous instrumentation and striking effects.

The most interesting number upon the programme was undoubtedly the ballet music from Prof. John K. Paine's unpublished opera, "Azara." Though Prof. Paine, who has occupied the chair of music at Harvard for many years, has long been recognized as one of the foremost of American musicians, he has never been a polific composer. Such works as he has produced—his early oratorio, "St. Peter," and some smaller compositions, both vocal and instrumental—have been marked by strict adherence to the classical form. In this opera, the work of his later and riper years, he has, if the numbers played last night are a fair example, gone completely over to the camp of the moderns. The music is both forceful and dramatic, while retaining the graces of style and the technical fluency that have characterized Prof. Paine's other works. But for brilliancy of orchestration, for startling effects and a general effect of freedom from classicism, these dances might have been written by Wagner himself.

They were heard here last night for the first time, and were received with the greatest favor. There will be much curiosity to hear the complete work from which these excerpts are taken, and if the same brilliant character is retained therein it would seem that it could hardly fail of success.

The closing orchestral number was Beethoven's eighth symphony, one of the shortest and least often heard of the great composer's works in the symphonic form. Why it should not be played oftener is hard to understand, as it is remarkably fresh and interesting, indeed, in some ways one of the most interesting of the whole nine. It was given a particularly fine rendering, and received the heartiest applause.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Timothee Adamowski, whose facile technic and individuality of style found ample room for display and expression in Lalo's brilliant concerto. It cannot be said that the work amounts to very much except as a vehicle for illustrating the player's ability to surmount technical difficulties; though the slow movement contains some pretty bits of cantilena. Mr. Adamowski scored a pronounced success, and bowed graciously in response to several recalls.

Mr. Gericke was back at the conductor's desk after a brief absence on account of illness, and was received with cordial demonstrations of welcome. The orchestra has never done finer work than it is now doing under his able leadership. The eighth and last concert of the series for this season will be given on Wednesday evening, April 25.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 14, 1900.

Of the Symphony there is really nothing to say beyond commending unstintedly Mr. Gericke and his forces. For the programme was thoroughly familiar,—beginning with Haydn's lively and cheery "Military" symphony, proceeding with the full, solemn Mass music and religious temper of the prelude to "Parsifal," and ending with the first symphony of Brahms. There was no soloist.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1900.

Symphony Concert — Haydn, Wagner and Brahms.

It was purely an orchestral programme and presented no novelty of any kind, a simple musical feast to end Lent with; nevertheless after the Haydn simplicities had been disposed of the concert seemed aglow with life and interest. The list presented was Haydn, for tune, Wagner, for religion, and Brahms, for complexity. It began with Haydn's "Military" symphony. On the whole this was about as martial as the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, and suggested parade rather than battlefield. Even the second movement, with its sharp contrasts between the oboe and the trumpet, its skips from woodwind to bass drum, did not seem extremely fiery. There was an epoch when this and other movements in Haydn's symphonies were regarded as "over-loaded"! Verily, times change and music changes with them.

The Minuet, spite of a little extra force which was given to it, was not essentially different from a couple of hundred other Minuets which Haydn has composed, and after hearing the pretty chief-theme of the finale over and over one was obliged to confess that Haydn was very much like history in the matter of repeating himself.

Possibly the amiable and gossipy side of Haydn was accentuated by the power of the "Parsifal" prelude which directly followed it. The performance of this was an especially grandiose one, and sounded like a poem of Milton read after a set of verses by Tupper; the juxtaposition was very unfair to the old composer. The opening phrases of the prelude (the "Communion" or "Ahendmahl" motive) were given much louder than we have heard Mottl read them, at Bayreuth, but we think this broad treatment an improvement upon the authorized reading, even though Madame Wagner has said that her husband wished the motive "sighed out."

Most nobly did the brasses thunder forth the "Faith" motive! And what a grand old religious theme it is! Here Wagner is not the restless, modulatory composer that he becomes in the second act of this opera, but he remains as diatonic as any of the 15th century church composers, giving a fine touch of old catholic music.

There is an uncomfortable greatness in the work, yet it remains the most powerful communion service ever written. One may enjoy "The Mastersingers" more, it fits much more snugly to everyday human nature, but a gold crown will always be somewhat less snug than a felt hat, or even an Easter bonnet.

The whole prelude was rather suggestive of Easter than of Lent, (the "Good-Friday Music" would have suited better to the latter), for if ever the Church Militant and the Church Triumphant, were pictured in tones, it is in these lofty, and often stern, measures. That the work appealed to the audience was very evident, for recall followed recall, and Mr. Gericke was obliged to bow his thanks again and again.

Then came Brahms with his most characteristic symphony, the first, in C minor, the one which devout Brahmins call "the tenth symphony." Brahms did not shrivel up before Wagner as Haydn had done; his lack of intense passion was emphasized by the contrast of the works, but the sure hand, the ability to attain absolutely what he was striving for, was evident in every measure of the complex symphony.

Wagner often had Brahms' works played to him, but confessed that he was repelled by them. He once playfully exclaimed: "If Brahms sounded as well as Beethoven, he would be a great composer, too!" But he definitely denied Brahms' greatness.

As well demand of an artist who had lived all his days in Kentucky and never left his inland state, to give a great picture of the ocean, as of the phlegmatic, studious and self-centered Brahms to depict wild longing and tender yearning. One can go beyond Wagner and say that if Brahms had possessed Beethoven's emotional and idealistic nature he would have been greater than Beethoven, for we hazard the statement that the intellectual side of this C minor symphony, its wonderful and subtile development, will wear better than that of the C minor symphony which Beethoven created. One misses, however, the equipoise of brain and heart, of intellect and emotion, in the great works of Brahms.

The symphony received a great performance, and it was pleasant to observe that the composer did not cause an exodus of as large proportions as in past days. Formerly, when a Brahms work closed one of the symphony concerts, hosts of people seized their overcoats and hats and made for the doors; the courteous rule of making an exit between the movements was temporarily abrogated, and caravans started for the outer air, (finding no recognizable air in the work), even in the midst of Andantes and of Intermezzos. "Nous avons changee tout cela!" Our music-lovers have studied the master and have found hidden glories in his works, have discovered beauty where they thought all was a desert. Last Saturday not only almost the entire audience remained to the end, but the enthusiasm that burst forth at the conclusion of the Finale was remarkable. Such an outburst was a revelation; there must be a real musical culture in a city which ecstatically applauds the complex first symphony of Johannes Brahms!

Louis C. Elson.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Fine Performance of Familiar Works—A Word About Mrs. Beach's Concerto Played at the Preceding Concert.

The program of the 22d Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Military"....Haydn
Prelude to "Parsifal"................Wagner
Symphony No. 1..........................Brahms

The symphony by Haydn was read with marked care by Mr. Gericke, and the performance was delightful for spirit, precision and finesse. The pleasure with which the work was heard came more from the exquisite performance than from the inherent beauty of the music, for many of the pages are little better than padding. The children of this world have lost in large measure the capability for enjoying the affability and amiability of such music, in which there is no goad to analysis—except to the maker of program-books—in which there is no spur to self-introspection, nor are we to be consoled by the assurance that Haydn was a skilled musician. All this is no doubt unfortunate, and some may regard it as almost criminal, but the truth remains that in this symphony Haydn does not get the other side of the skin.

The prelude to "Parsifal" is another matter. It gains, of course, immensely when it is heard at Bayreuth, with the orchestra hidden, and in the darkened theatre. Whether it is truly sacred music, or merely pseudo-sacred, is a question that need not be discussed here, although it has served pamphleteers in Germany, France, Belgium and England. Indeed, Mr. Runciman has gone so far as to denounce "Parsifal" as a distinctly immoral work. However this may be, the prelude, as played last night, made a profound effect, which, if it were only sensorial, was nevertheless real. The different bands were at their best, and strings, wood-wind, and brass were combined in splendid rivalry.

I wonder how the first movement of the symphony by Brahms would sound, if there were less respect paid to the "slow allegro." The answer made to any one objecting to certain sluggishness in tempo or protesting against sudden slackening in pace is that Brahms himself wished his music to be played that way. This is not a final, seam-stopping, hole-plugging answer. But I doubt whether any tempo, fast or slow, could make this music a thing of imperishable strength or beauty, and the symphony as a whole is inferior to the second, which is the most truly musical and spontaneous of Brahms's works in this form.

⁂

I have been asked by a correspondent why I did not write an article about the concert of the Saturday the week before, when Mrs. Beach's new piano-concerto was played for the first time. I did write an article, and it was published in some copies of the Journal of last Sunday, but, on account of an accident in the press room, the article did not appear in the whole edition.

It is now a week since the concerto was played with Mrs. Beach herself as the pianist, and the disappointment of the first night is only deeper today. The concerto was a disappointment in nearly every way. The structure was large, pretentious; there was an over-abundance of outside ornamentation; but the interior was bare and common-place, and there was a well-defined suspicion that the foundations and walls were not substantial. The themes were not distinguished; the development was too often vague and rambling; the moods, when there were moods, were those of other composers; thus the mood of the opening measures of the slow movement was palpably Wagnerian. The first movement was long drawn out, and when there was the thought of the end, there was a curiously unexpected and meaningless appendix. The scherzo was harmonically monotonous, and the finale—not one measure now remains in the memory. The orchestration was crude and necessarily ineffective.

Mrs. Beach is indisputably a woman of pronounced musical talent. She has proved this in less ambitious works. It is a pity that she has never had a thorough, severe drill in theory and orchestration. Her symphony led one to believe that natural talent, self-study, close observation, might do much without painful labor under a pedagogue; but this piano-concerto does not encourage any such belief. The task was an ambitious one; the composer was not equal to it. There were notes, notes, notes; and where there were so many notes there were inevitably a few pretty passages; but there was little or no display of vital musical thought, proportion, skill in structure or taste or brilliance in orchestral expression.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was no musical frivolity shown by Mr Gericke in making up the symphony program for the 22d rehearsal and concert, the three numbers being in keeping with the character of the season's observances. Haydn's "Military" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Brahms' first symphony contain but little that savors of gayety or abandon, and these solid works made up the program. The Haydn symphony is not very often heard nowadays, and although there is much in the long work which reveals Haydn's great ability in orchestration, the piece is so largely episodic and the movements bear so slight a relation to each other that the form and matter does not appeal very strongly to the interest of any except musical experts. The term "military" does not really suggest the character of the number, although the use of drums and cymbals in the second and fourth parts has given the martial title to the work. The orchestra gave a conscientious interpretation of each part, and in the second and also the closing portion of the fourth movement the playing was made specially interesting, the substance of the composition being less dry than in the other parts.

So far as the orchestral work was concerned the players are deserving of the usual meed of praise, for any composition at their hands receives an artistic interpretation, and yesterday's program emphasized this fact. From the old-fashioned Haydn to Wagner's "Parsifal" is a long step, and yet how grandly the Wagner prelude was given! Probably the contrast was so marked that the latter number was the gainer thereby, and it certainly did sound wonderfully impressive and as near to perfection in form and execution as one could expect. The Brahms' symphony is splendidly constructed, although the first movement is perhaps a bit austere and vague, and the last three movements are sufficiently melodic to appeal to most any musical taste. The buoyant nature of the second part was charmingly set forth, and the "peans of praise" in the last movement were sung grandly by all the instruments. Mr Gericke's reading was admirable throughout and the orchestra gave renewed evidence to that perfect "team work" always associated with the organization.

Mr Ben Davies will be the soloist this week. In addition to his arias the program will comprise Spohr's "Consecration of Tears," "Mazeppa," a symphonic poem by Liszt, first time at these concerts, and "Huldigung's Marsch," Wagner.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The 15th season of promenade concerts will begin Thursday evening, May 10, the orchestra being made up by the usual half-hundred Symphony men, with Mr Max Zach as conductor. The thousands of patrons will this season find their favorite amusement located in Mechanic's hall on Huntington av, but the tickets will be placed on sale at Music hall, April 23.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 105.

SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Playing of Orchestra Was of Exceptional Beauty.

There Was No Soloist—A Fine Performance of the Wagner Prelude Given—Mr. Gericke Three Times Recalled to the Conductor's Stand.

The 22d concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Symphony, "Military"....................Haydn
Prelude to "Parsifal"....................Wagner
Symphony No. 1, in C minor............Brahms

As will be seen, the concert was without either novelty or soloist, but it was none the less interesting on that account, for the playing of the orchestra was of exceptional beauty throughout. That fine body of artists was never heard to more splendid advantage than it was in its performance of the Wagner prelude. The wonderful volume and purity of its string tone were never exemplified with more impressive nobility, nor was the exquisite balance of the wood wind ever more delightfully set forth. Mr. Gericke's reading of the score was masterly in every way, and it is difficult to recall when it has had here as clear, as satisfying and as chastely colored an interpretation as he accorded it last evening.

How fully the audience appreciated the exceptional charm of the performance was made manifest by the prolonged applause and the three recalls of Mr. Gericke to the conductor's stand. The magnificent treatment of the first allegro of the Brahms symphony again emphasized how thoroughly in sympathy with this composer are both conductor and orchestra. The Haydn symphony is not among the master's most interesting works. Except in its finale it begins to sound almost affectedly naive in themes and orchestration. Even its prettiness is not the best prettiness of the composer. The rendering, however, was felicitously Haydnesque in spirit.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "The Consecration of Tones," Spohr; symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Liszt, for the first time at these concerts, and Wagner's "Huldigung's Marsch." Mr. Ben Davies is to be the soloist and will sing two arias.

[illegible] JOURNAL.
[illegible] BY THE
THURSDAY, APRIL 12, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Performance of a Fresh and Interesting Programme.

The seventh concert of the Symphony series was given in Infantry Hall last evening before an appreciative audience. The programme was made up of novelties, or what might be termed such, as one of the four numbers was absolutely new, and the others, though they have been played at some time in other concerts, were unfamiliar to a considerable extent. The list was as follows:

Overture, "Sappho," op. 44....Karl Goldmark
Spanish Symphony for violin and orchestra, in D minor, op. 21............Edouard Lalo
- I. Allegro non troppo (D minor).
- II. Scherzando: Allegro molto (G major).
- III. Andante (D minor).
- IV. Dondo: Allegro (D major.)

Ballet-music from the opera "Azara;" three Moorish dances....John Knowles Paine
(First time.)
- I. Allegretto animato (G minor).
- II. Poco meno mosso (G major).
- III. Introduction: Allegretto quasi Andante. Allegretto con moto e graziso (A major).

Symphony No. 8, in F major. op. 93 ....Ludwig van Beethoven
- I. Allegro vivace e con brio (F major).
- II. Allegretto scherzando (B-flat major).
- III. Tempo di menuetto (F major).
- IV. Allegro vivace (M major).

Goldmark's enormously brilliant overture was played with the greatest spirit and received hearty applause. This is a comparatively new work, having been composed but a half-dozen years ago, and is quite up to the level of Goldmark's previous offerings in its gorgeous instrumentation and striking effects.

The most interesting number upon the programme was undoubtedly the ballet music from Prof. John K. Paine's unpublished opera, "Azara." Though Prof. Paine, who has occupied the chair of music at Harvard for many years, has long been recognized as one of the foremost of American musicians, he has never been a polific composer. Such works as he has produced—his early oratorio, "St. Peter," and some smaller compositions, both vocal and instrumental—have been marked by strict adherence to the classical form. In this opera, the work of his later and riper years, he has, if the numbers played last night are a fair example, gone completely over to the camp of the moderns. The music is both forceful and dramatic, while retaining the graces of style and the technical fluency that have characterized Prof. Paine's other works. But for brilliancy of orchestration, for startling effects and a general effect of freedom from classicism, these dances might have been written by Wagner himself.

They were heard here last night for the first time, and were received with the greatest favor. There will be much curiosity to hear the complete work from which these excerpts are taken, and if the same brilliant character is retained therein it would seem that it could hardly fail of success.

The closing orchestral number was Beethoven's eighth symphony, one of the shortest and least often heard of the great composer's works in the symphonic form. Why it should not be played oftener is hard to understand, as it is ramarkably fresh and interesting, indeed, in some ways one of the most interesting of the whole nine. It was given a particularly fine rendering, and received the heartiest applause.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Timothee Adamowski, whose facile technic and individuality of style found ample room for display and expression in Lalo's brilliant concerto. It cannot be said that the work amounts to very much except as a vehicle for illustrating the player's ability to surmount technical difficulties; though the slow movement contains some pretty bits of cantilena. Mr. Adamowski scored a pronounced success, and bowed graciously in response to several recalls.

Mr. Gericke was back at the conductor's desk after a brief absence on account of illness, and was received with cordial demonstrations of welcome. The orchestra has never done finer work than it is now doing under his able leadership. The eighth and last concert of the series for this season will be given on Wednesday evening, April 25.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 14, 1900.

Of the Symphony there is really nothing to say beyond commending unstintedly Mr. Gericke and his forces. For the programme was thoroughly familiar,—beginning with Haydn's lively and cheery "Military" symphony, proceeding with the full, solemn Mass music and religious temper of the prelude to "Parsifal," and ending with the first symphony of Brahms. There was no soloist.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1900.

Symphony Concert — Haydn, Wagner and Brahms.

It was purely an orchestral programme and presented no novelty of any kind, a simple musical feast to end Lent with; nevertheless after the Haydn simplicities had been disposed of the concert seemed aglow with life and interest. The list presented was Haydn, for tune, Wagner, for religion, and Brahms, for complexity. It began with Haydn's "Military" symphony. On the whole this was about as martial as the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, and suggested parade rather than battlefield. Even the second movement, with its sharp contrasts between the oboe and the trumpet, its skips from woodwind to bass drum, did not seem extremely fiery. There was an epoch when this and other movements in Haydn's symphonies were regarded as "over-loaded"! Verily, times change and music changes with them.

The Minuet, spite of a little extra force which was given to it, was not essentially different from a couple of hundred other Minuets which Haydn has composed, and after hearing the pretty chief-theme of the finale over and over one was obliged to confess that Haydn was very much like history in the matter of repeating himself.

Possibly the amiable and gossipy side of Haydn was accentuated by the power of the "Parsifal" prelude which directly followed it. The performance of this was an especially grandiose one, and sounded like a poem of Milton read after a set of verses by Tupper; the juxtaposition was very unfair to the old composer. The opening phrases of the prelude (the "Communion" or "Ahendmahl" motive) were given much louder than we have heard Mottl read them, at Bayreuth, but we think this broad treatment an improvement upon the authorized reading, even though Madame Wagner has said that her husband wished the motive "sighed out."

Most nobly did the brasses thunder forth the "Faith" motive! And what a grand old religious theme it is! Here Wagner is not the restless, modulatory composer that he becomes in the second act of this opera, but he remains as diatonic as any of the 15th century church composers, giving a fine touch of old catholic music.

There is an uncomfortable greatness in the work, yet it remains the most powerful communion service ever written. One may enjoy "The Mastersingers" more, it fits much more snugly to everyday human nature, but a gold crown will always be somewhat less snug than a felt hat, or even an Easter bonnet.

The whole prelude was rather suggestive of Easter than of Lent, (the "Good-Friday Music" would have suited better to the latter), for if ever the Church Militant and the Church Triumphant, were pictured in tones, it is in these lofty, and often stern, measures. That the work appealed to the audience was very evident, for recall followed recall, and Mr. Gericke was obliged to bow his thanks again and again.

Then came Brahms with his most characteristic symphony, the first, in C minor, the one which devout Brahmins call "the tenth symphony." Brahms did not shrivel up before Wagner as Haydn had done; his lack of intense passion was emphasized by the contrast of the works, but the sure hand, the ability to attain absolutely what he was striving for, was evident in every measure of the complex symphony.

Wagner often had Brahms' works played to him, but confessed that he was repelled by them. He once playfully exclaimed: "If Brahms sounded as well as Beethoven, he would be a great composer, too!" But he definitely denied Brahms' greatness.

As well demand of an artist who had lived all his days in Kentucky and never left his inland state, to give a great picture of the ocean, as of the phlegmatic, studious and self-centered Brahms to depict wild longing and tender yearning. One can go beyond Wagner and say that if Brahms had possessed Beethoven's emotional and idealistic nature he would have been greater than Beethoven, for we hazard the statement that the intellectual side of this C minor symphony, its wonderful and subtile development, will wear better than that of the C minor symphony which Beethoven created. One misses, however, the equipoise of brain and heart, of intellect and emotion, in the great works of Brahms.

The symphony received a great performance, and it was pleasant to observe that the composer did not cause an exodus of as large proportions as in past days. Formerly, when a Brahms work closed one of the symphony concerts, hosts of people seized their overcoats and hats and made for the doors; the courteous rule of making an exit between the movements was temporarily abrogated, and caravans started for the outer air, (finding no recognizable air in the work), even in the midst of Andantes and of Intermezzos. "Nous avons changee tout cela!" Our music-lovers have studied the master and have found hidden glories in his works, have discovered beauty where they thought all was a desert. Last Saturday not only almost the entire audience remained to the end, but the enthusiasm that burst forth at the conclusion of the Finale was remarkable. Such an outburst was a revelation; there must be a real musical culture in a city which ecstatically applauds the complex first symphony of Johannes Brahms!

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1900.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Fine Performance of Familiar Works—A Word About Mrs. Beach's Concerto Played at the Preceding Concert.

The program of the 22d Symphony concert, given last night in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in G major, "Military"....Haydn
Prelude to "Parsifal"................Wagner
Symphony No. 1.........................Brahms

The symphony by Haydn was read with marked care by Mr. Gericke, and the performance was delightful for spirit, precision and finesse. The pleasure with which the work was heard came more from the exquisite performance than from the inherent beauty of the music, for many of the pages are little better than padding. The children of this world have lost in large measure the capability for enjoying the affability and amiability of such music, in which there is no goad to analysis—except to the maker of program-books—in which there is no spur to self-introspection, nor are we to be consoled by the assurance that Haydn was a skilled musician. All this is no doubt unfortunate, and some may regard it as almost criminal, but the truth remains that in this symphony Haydn does not get the other side of the skin.

The prelude to "Parsifal" is another matter. It gains, of course, immensely when it is heard at Bayreuth, with the orchestra hidden, and in the darkened theatre. Whether it is truly sacred music, or merely pseudo-sacred, is a question that need not be discussed here, although it has served pamphleteers in Germany, France, Belgium and England. Indeed, Mr. Runciman has gone so far as to denounce "Parsifal" as a distinctly immoral work. However this may be, the prelude, as played last night, made a profound effect, which, if it were only sensorial, was nevertheless real. The different bands were at their best, and strings, wood-wind, and brass were combined in splendid rivalry.

I wonder how the first movement of the symphony by Brahms would sound, if there were less respect paid to the "slow allegro." The answer made to any one objecting to certain sluggishness in tempo or protesting against sudden slackening in pace is that Brahms himself wished his music to be played that way. This is not a final, seam-stopping, hole-plugging answer. But I doubt whether any tempo, fast or slow, could make this music a thing of imperishable strength or beauty, and the symphony as a whole is inferior to the second, which is the most truly musical and spontaneous of Brahms's works in this form.

⁂

I have been asked by a correspondent why I did not write an article about the concert of the Saturday the week before, when Mrs. Beach's new piano-concerto was played for the first time. I did write an article, and it was published in some copies of the Journal of last Sunday, but, on account of an accident in the press room, the article did not appear in the whole edition.

It is now a week since the concerto was played with Mrs. Beach herself as the pianist, and the disappointment of the first night is only deeper today. The concerto was a disappointment in nearly every way. The structure was large, pretentious; there was an overabundance of outside ornamentation; but the interior was bare and commonplace, and there was a well-defined suspicion that the foundations and walls were not substantial. The themes were not distinguished; the development was too often vague and rambling; the moods, when there were moods, were those of other composers; thus the mood of the opening measures of the slow movement was palpably Wagnerian. The first movement was long drawn out, and when there was the thought of the end, there was a curiously unexpected and meaningless appendix. The scherzo was harmonically monotonous, and the finale—not one measure now remains in the memory. The orchestration was crude and necessarily ineffective.

Mrs. Beach is indisputably a woman of pronounced musical talent. She has proved this in less ambitious works. It is a pity that she has never had a thorough, severe drill in theory and orchestration. Her symphony led one to believe that natural talent, self-study, close observation, might do much without painful labor under a pedagogue; but this piano-concerto does not encourage any such belief. The task was an ambitious one; the composer was not equal to it. There were notes, notes, notes; and where there were so many notes there were inevitably a few pretty passages; but there was little or no display of vital musical thought, proportion, skill in structure or taste or brilliance in orchestral expression.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

There was no musical frivolity shown by Mr Gericke in making up the symphony program for the 22d rehearsal and concert, the three numbers being in keeping with the character of the season's observances. Haydn's "Military" symphony, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Brahms' first symphony contain but little that savors of gayety or abandon, and these solid works made up the program. The Haydn symphony is not very often heard nowadays, and although there is much in the long work which reveals Haydn's great ability in orchestration, the piece is so largely episodic and the movements bear so slight a relation to each other that the form and matter does not appeal very strongly to the interest of any except musical experts. The term "military" does not really suggest the character of the number, although the use of drums and cymbals in the second and fourth parts has given the martial title to the work. The orchestra gave a conscientious interpretation of each part, and in the second and also the closing portion of the fourth movement the playing was made specially interesting, the substance of the composition being less dry than in the other parts.

So far as the orchestral work was concerned the players are deserving of the usual meed of praise, for any composition at their hands receives an artistic interpretation, and yesterday's program emphasized this fact. From the old-fashioned Haydn to Wagner's "Parsifal" is a long step, and yet how grandly the Wagner prelude was given! Probably the contrast was so marked that the latter number was the gainer thereby, and it certainly did sound wonderfully impressive and as near to perfection in form and execution as one could expect. The Brahms' symphony is splendidly constructed, although the first movement is perhaps a bit austere and vague, and the last three movements are sufficiently melodic to appeal to most any musical taste. The buoyant nature of the second part was charmingly set forth, and the "peans of praise" in the last movement were sung grandly by all the instruments. Mr Gericke's reading was admirable throughout and the orchestra gave renewed evidence to that perfect "team work" always associated with the organization.

Mr Ben Davies will be the soloist this week. In addition to his arias the program will comprise Spohr's "Consecration of Tears," "Mazeppa," a symphonic poem by Liszt, first time at these concerts, and "Huldigung's Marsch," Wagner.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The 15th season of promenade concerts will begin Thursday evening, May 10, the orchestra being made up by the usual half-hundred Symphony men, with Mr Max Zach as conductor. The thousands of patrons will this season find their favorite amusement located in Mechanic's hall on Huntington av, but the tickets will be placed on sale at Music hall, April 23.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 105.
SUNDAY, APRIL 15, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Playing of Orchestra Was of Exceptional Beauty.

There Was No Soloist—A Fine Performance of the Wagner Prelude Given—Mr. Gericke Three Times Recalled to the Conductor's Stand.

The 22d concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, with the following programme:

Symphony, "Military"....................Haydn
Prelude to "Parsifal"....................Wagner
Symphony No. 1, in C minor..........Brahms

As will be seen, the concert was without either novelty or soloist, but it was none the less interesting on that account, for the playing of the orchestra was of exceptional beauty throughout. That fine body of artists was never heard to more splendid advantage than it was in its performance of the Wagner prelude. The wonderful volume and purity of its string tone were never exemplified with more impressive nobility, nor was the exquisite balance of the wood wind ever more delightfully set forth. Mr. Gericke's reading of the score was masterly in every way, and it is difficult to recall when it has had here as clear, as satisfying and as chastely colored an interpretation as he accorded it last evening.

How fully the audience appreciated the exceptional charm of the performance was made manifest by the prolonged applause and the three recalls of Mr. Gericke to the conductor's stand. The magnificent treatment of the first allegro of the Brahms symphony again emphasized how thoroughly in sympathy with this composer are both conductor and orchestra. The Haydn symphony is not among the master's most interesting works. Except in its finale it begins to sound almost affectedly naive in themes and orchestration. Even its prettiness is not the best prettiness of the composer. The rendering, however, was felicitously Haydnesque in spirit.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony, "The Consecration of Tones," Spohr; symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," Liszt, for the first time at these concerts, and Wagner's "Huldigung's Marsch." Mr. Ben Davies is to be the soloist and will sing two arias.

[illegible]

MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

At its twenty-second concert this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this programme:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, "Military."
Wagner: Prelude to "Parsifal."
Brahms: Symphony No. 1, C minor.

The Haydn symphony went with animation and with the nicest finish. Wonder if many people do not have the same experience with early symphonies that we have. During the last few Haydn symphonies we have heard and the Mozart G minor symphony that was played early this winter, we have thought, throughout the first movement: "What fresh, spontaneous themes; what variety of tone color; after all, those old masters could get as beautiful effects with their little bands as the modern masters can with their overgrown orchestras." By the end of the slow movement (in the Haydn symphony, played Saturday, by the way, the "slow movement" happens to be a "military march") we have found our attention inclined to wander. By the time the minuet, after the trio, has been repeated da capo, we have given up trying to keep our minds on the music. And by the end of the finale, we have admitted to ourselves that, after all, these early symphonies sound rather trivial, and are a little tiresome to listen to. In the Haydn and Dittersdorf quartets, however, that the Kneisels played this winter, we have had no such feeling as in the symphonies. Is this the result of hearing so much orchestral music by Tchaikowsky, Dvorak and Richard Strauss?

Some conductors, notably Hans Richter, get a beautiful, mysterious effect by beginning the prelude to "Parsifal" with the softest tone possible, so faint that for a bar or two you feel rather than know that the orchestra is playing; at the close, too, Richter lets the sound die away to the merest breath. Mr. Gericke, however, chose to begin and to end the prelude with a good deal of tone. Barring this point, which is one of taste only, the prelude was beautifully played indeed, the Blood motive coming out with infinite tenderness, the Grail motive with great nobility, and the Faith motive with vast strength and power.

A sharp contrast to the prelude was the first movement of the Brahms symphony, which Mr. Gericke conducted with all the unyielding relentlessness that this music absolutely demands. He brought out beautifully, too, the poetry of the second movement and of the introduction to the finale, and the joyous spirit of the finale itself.

The orchestra played the symphony, as it played throughout the evening, superbly. The audience applauded heartily after the prelude and the Brahms symphony. The concert, indeed, was one of the best we have had this year. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Spohr, "Consecration of Tones"; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"; Wagner, "Huldigung's March." Mr. Ben Davies, tenor, will sing two arias.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1900.

Symphony Concert — Spohr's "Consecration of Tones."

We think it was Spohr's widow who said, just after his death—"He has gone to the only place where his music can be excelled!" which epitaph was afterwards plagiarized by the widow of a pyrotechnist with—"My husband has gone to the only place where his fireworks can be excelled!" If the first remark be true, and the celestial harmony be like that of Spohr, we fear it will become tiresome before even the first 10,000 years of eternity have passed!

Spohr's symphony called "The Consecration of Tones," was the first number of the concert of Saturday. It exhibited all the merits and all the defects of the Spohr school. Spohr was supposed to be romantic because he was very chromatic in his progressions, but it took only a very few minutes to convince the auditor that something besides chromatic progressions was necessary to portray passion. The "Turmoil of the Elements" with which the symphony began, was not much more impressive than the formal and contrapuntal picture of chaos with which Haydn began his "Creation." Spohr had a great gift of repetition, and his symphony has many phrases which might be labelled—"I beg to reiterate," "As I said before," "Let me tell you once more," etc. The "Sounds of Nature" were a very diminutive "Waldesweben" with a very insistent cuckoo thrown in, and a great deal of Spohr circumlocution added. The opening movement was in good form, spite of the chaotic subjects it dealt with, and had at least the advantage of being very easily comprehended.

The second movement was throughout better, for it represented the lyric side of the evolution of tones, and Spohr had a gift of writing clear and sometimes beautiful tunes. There were three of them in this and they were in good contrast to each other. The serenade gave Mr. Schroeder an excellent violoncello obbligato which was charmingly interpreted. The mingling of the three melodies, at the close of the movement, was one of the best points of the symphony, being ingenious without exhibiting that straining for effect which often appears when the modern composers set forth their juggleries with rhythms.

In the third movement grim-visaged War began to show his wrinkled front, somewhat smoothed for the occasion by our prim composer. There were trumpet fanfares, snare-drum rolls, cymbal clashes, bass-drum poundings, etc., as the army trekked on; yet the result was not sanguinary, not the capture of even a single kopje was suggested; it was the home guards on parade, with Sousa's full band at the front. The Hymn of Thanksgiving which followed ought to have ended the work, for it is the true climax and Spohr has come as near to being heroic here as his nature will allow.

The finale came in the nature of an anti-climax; a funeral theme is treated at some length and then a long portrayal of "Consolation in Tears" follows, with the same reiteration that has characterized the first movement. It was all finely played, but we fear that the symphonies of Spohr are as hopelessly antiquated as the novels of Richardson. The fact that Spohr chose to copy Haydn and Mozart and to despise Beethoven tells against him now. That he had some real desire for dramatic effects, however, is shown by his appreciation of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Ben Davies was the vocalist of the concert and appeared in the second number with "Waft her, angels," which he sang very finely, with sturdy voice, excellent phrasing, clear enunciation, and commendable dramatic effect. He deserved the hearty applause that he won in this number. Not so in the second number! This was Cowen's "Dream of Endymion." Judging by the results, there is not a doubt but that Endymion had eaten mince pie and lobster salad just before going to sleep. There is no denying the fervor of this work; Cowen has pumped it in most laboriously; the thermometer is continuously at 110 in the shade; but it remains as conventional as a book of etiquette; it reminds one of Heine's little tailor who lay abed, perspiring, and dreamed of the Queen of Sheba. It is difficult to speak calmly of such weak stuff, and when one thinks of the poetic height which Cowen attained in his Scandinavian symphony, one can only be astonished the more. The ecstatic orchestration of the work may be characterized as Wagner-and-water.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," has not been heard in the city for a long while. It was given in the old Philharmonic days, when Boston's orchestral music, Heavenly maid, was young, and was conducted by Bernard Listemann. This work trots out one of the best steeds in the musical stable. In this stable there stand Grane, the Walkyrian stud, Mephistopheles' pair of blacks, of the Avernian line, and the spirited charger owned and driven by Lenore's lover.

The work is not as effective as some of the "Poemes Symphoniques," but is none the less an exciting and brilliant number. The ride itself is not comparable to Berlioz's "Ride to Hades" in graphic effect, but the bold start of the composition, with cymbal clash, the death of the steed, and above all, the savagery and Orientalism of the final triumph, are thrilling touches. One could not help comparing this torrent of military ardor, with the tepid martial touches of Spohr, which had preceded; the contrast was marked even in the fanfares which occurred copiously in both compositions. The Liszt work was performed with tremendous spirit and power.

The concert ended with Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman." The reading was a fine one, and the struggle between the fierce motive which represented the Dutchman and the tender phrase which portrayed Senta and the salvation of the hero, was admirably delineated. Altogether the programme was one of sustained interest even if some of the numbers were unequal in merit.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII, NO. 112.

SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Melodious Spohr Symphony Is Heard Again Here.

It Was Read and Played with Surpassing Beauty of Style—The Liszt Symphonic Poem—Mr. Davies Contributed Two Solos—Singer Cordially Received.

The programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Symphony, "The Consecration of Tones"...Spohr
"Deeper and Deeper Still," and "Waft Her, Angels"..........Handel
Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"..........Liszt
Scena, "The Dream of Endymion"........Cowen
(First time in Boston.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...Wagner

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist.

It was a pleasure to listen to the graceful and melodious Spohr symphony again; especially to the first and second movements, with their flowing harmonies and their exquisite instrumentation. The third movement has taken on something of the aspect of banality, and the finale of garrulity, but there are charming moments even in them of delightful tone-color, vigorous dramatic power and splendor of treatment.

It seems curious, in this era of extreme eccentricity in modulation, that this work should have been attacked, when it was new, for its persistent chromatic harmonies, for now there is scarcely an ambitious song that does not eclipse it in this regard. It was read and played last evening with surpassing beauty of style.

The Liszt symphonic poem is chiefly interesting for the solidity, the richness and the effectiveness of its orchestration. Otherwise, it is notable only for its brilliant incoherency and its oscillations between blatant pretentiousness and poorly disguised commonplace. However, if Liszt may not be accorded a place among the composers of truly great orchestral works, his command over instrumental color falls little, if at all, behind that of Wagner himself, and in this work, which was given with magnificent fire and emphasis, his skill in this direction is exemplified with noble impressiveness.

Mr Davies, who was welcomed with great cordiality, sang his two solos with that perfection of artistic phrasing, that smoothness, justness of expression and thorough musical skill that have always so satisfyingly distinguished his work. His voice is much worn, and has become veiled, but his singing was still interesting for its mastery of style. But why did he sing that tiresome Cowen aria with its brummagem pathos, its roaring amativeness, and its extravagant absurdity? Endymion's dream? The young man was not dreaming, but was afflicted with a cruel attack of nightmare, the result, probably, of overmuch reflection on the Wagnerian opera plots of his day.

The programme for the next and last Symphony concert of the season is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Quintet, from "Cosi fan tutte," Mozart; and Ninth symphony, Beethoven. The soloists are to be Mme. De Vere Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Ben Davies and Mr. Herbert Witherspoon. The chorus will consist of members of the Cecilia.

There was a time a few years ago when the good Bostonian would have felt sentimental and sorry enough to say farewell to Music Hall. It will be remembered he had conniption fits when the coming change was first broached, but now he is entirely resigned at parting with the old hall that has worn its reputation out. The wisdom of this natural order of things is manifest in the ease with which the public lets go its old associations and adopts the new. It is true Music Hall is reeking with the germ association. The music microbe must be plastered thick on its walls, and ghosts must often occupy the familiar seats where so often in the flesh they listened to the eternal programmes, and dilated with the eternal emotions. In 40 years, fancy the amount. But Boston in all its sects and classes has taken part in a vast number of events which make this hall memorable. During the final Symphony concerts many an old patron has wondered how the new temple of art would seem to him, and if he should not miss the bad air and draughts of the grimy, half-lighted barn he once deemed "the best music hall in the country!" Dear, dear, let us sit tight this week, then, for if nothing earthquaky happens we shall be hearing the Symphony orchestra playing out on Huntington avenue next season.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 21, 1900.

"All things come round to him who will but wait," saith the proverb; and so Liszt's wild symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," produced in London at the end of 1876, has at last reached Boston, having been placed as the central number and novelty of the twenty-third Symphony programme. Liszt knew the story of what happened

"After dread Pultowa's day,
When fortune left the royal Swede,"

not directly from Byron's poem, from which schoolboys used to declaim and Adah Isaacs Menken to derive her most famous impersonation, but instead through the medium of Victor Hugo's version, which was meant more to portray the victory and apotheosis of genius developed through suffering than the three days' agonizing experiences of a rash young gentleman who had drawn upon his defenceless head the wrath of the jealous and cruel Tartar lord. Yet the shifting trend of the music indicates well enough the greater episodes in the flight of "that Tartar of the Ukraine Breed," which fled across desert steppes to fall dead with its perishing burden still pinioned to its back amid its amazed and horrified brethren of the wild and wandering herds. The beginning is made in a dashing allegro which passes into an andante when the desperate flight is finished and the steed drops lifeless; then when rescue, relief and restoration come, the allagro marziale of a triumphant march succeeds, ringing out bold Cossack strains in melodies of the Ukraine. The composition is most involved and difficult, and often takes on the character of wild rhapsody, far exceeding the usual reasonable limitations of the symphonic poem. Indeed a criticism of that earlier time declares that "a more incoherent series of ravings never were constructed for the torment of mankind." But in a generation mankind has heard a good deal and become used to a good deal which would have been accounted unbearable even less than thirty years ago; and the Music Hall audience, although pronouncing "Mazeppa" more trying and perplexing than the "Preludes" appeared on its introduction, yet managed to get satisfaction as well as surprise from it and to be able to appreciate and admire the superb skill, the fire, the rush, the strength and the strange effectiveness which Mr. Gericke and the orchestra imparted to the exacting score. The programme began with a noble and symmetrical reading of Spohr's most successful symphony "The Consecration of Tones," the subtitle of which is "A Characteristic Tone Painting in the form of a Symphony," after a poem by Carl Pfeiffer.

The four movements fully illustrate the poem, as well as the grace, power and poetic feeling of the composer.

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist and in the recitative and aria from Handel's "Jephthah," as in the scene "The Dream of Endymion" by Cowen, used his fine voice to bring out the beauty of the music.

The latter number, principally in recitative, was well orchestrated; indeed the interest seemed to centre in the orchestra, since the voice, used principally for declamation, could not have the melodic charm which is its right.

The concert closed with the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," given with a fire and precision quite electrifying.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 16, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

At its twenty-second concert this season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played this programme:

Haydn: Symphony in G major, "Military."
Wagner: Prelude to "Parsifal."
Brahms: Symphony No. 1, C minor.

The Haydn symphony went with animation and with the nicest finish. Wonder if many people do not have the same experience with early symphonies that we have. During the last few Haydn symphonies we have heard and the Mozart G minor symphony that was played early this winter, we have thought, throughout the first movement: "What fresh, spontaneous themes; what variety of tone color; after all, those old masters could get as beautiful effects with their little bands as the modern masters can with their overgrown orchestras." By the end of the slow movement (in the Haydn symphony, played Saturday, by the way, the "slow movement" happens to be a "military march") we have found our attention inclined to wander. By the time the minuet, after the trio, has been repeated da capo, we have given up trying to keep our minds on the music. And by the end of the finale, we have admitted to ourselves that, after all, these early symphonies sound rather trivial, and are a little tiresome to listen to. In the Haydn and Dittersdorf quartets, however, that the Kneisels played this winter, we have had no such feeling as in the symphonies. Is this the result of hearing so much orchestral music by Tchaikowsky, Dvorak and Richard Strauss?

Some conductors, notably Hans Richter, get a beautiful, mysterious effect by beginning the prelude to "Parsifal" with the softest tone possible, so faint that for a bar or two you feel rather than know that the orchestra is playing; at the close, too, Richter lets the sound die away to the merest breath. Mr. Gericke, however, chose to begin and to end the prelude with a good deal of tone. Barring this point, which is one of taste only, the prelude was beautifully played indeed, the Blood motive coming out with infinite tenderness, the Grail motive with great nobility, and the Faith motive with vast strength and power.

A sharp contrast to the prelude was the first movement of the Brahms symphony, which Mr. Gericke conducted with all the unyielding relentlessness that this music absolutely demands. He brought out beautifully, too, the poetry of the second movement and of the introduction to the finale, and the joyous spirit of the finale itself.

The orchestra played the symphony, as it played throughout the evening, superbly. The audience applauded heartily after the prelude and the Brahms symphony. The concert, indeed, was one of the best we have had this year. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Spohr, "Consecration of Tones"; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"; Wagner, "Huldigung's March." Mr. Ben Davies, tenor, will sing two arias.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1900.

Symphony Concert — Spohr's "Consecration of Tones."

We think it was Spohr's widow who said, just after his death—"He has gone to the only place where his music can be excelled!" which epitaph was afterwards plagiarized by the widow of a pyrotechnist with—"My husband has gone to the only place where his fireworks can be excelled!" If the first remark be true, and the celestial harmony be like that of Spohr, we fear it will become tiresome before even the first 10,000 years of eternity have passed!

Spohr's symphony called "The Consecration of Tones," was the first number of the concert of Saturday. It exhibited all the merits and all the defects of the Spohr school. Spohr was supposed to be romantic because he was very chromatic in his progressions, but it took only a very few minutes to convince the auditor that something besides chromatic progressions was necessary to portray passion. The "Turmoil of the Elements" with which the symphony began, was not much more impressive than the formal and contrapuntal picture of chaos with which Haydn began his "Creation." Spohr had a great gift of repetition, and his symphony has many phrases which might be labelled—"I beg to reiterate," "As I said before," "Let me tell you once more," etc. The "Sounds of Nature" were a very diminutive "Waldesweben" with a very insistent cuckoo thrown in, and a great deal of Spohr circumlocution added. The opening movement was in good form, spite of the chaotic subjects it dealt with, and had at least the advantage of being very easily comprehended.

The second movement was throughout better, for it represented the lyric side of the evolution of tones, and Spohr had a gift of writing clear and sometimes beautiful tunes. There were three of them in this and they were in good contrast to each other. The serenade gave Mr. Schroeder an excellent violoncello obbligato which was charmingly interpreted. The mingling of the three melodies, at the close of the movement, was one of the best points of the symphony, being ingenious without exhibiting that straining for effect which often appears when the modern composers set forth their juggleries with rhythms.

In the third movement grim-visaged War began to show his wrinkled front, somewhat smoothed for the occasion by our prim composer. There were trumpet fanfares, snare-drum rolls, cymbal clashes, bass-drum poundings, etc., as the army trekked on; yet the result was not sanguinary, not the capture of even a single kopje was suggested: it was the home guards on parade, with Sousa's full band at the front. The Hymn of Thanksgiving which followed ought to have ended the work, for it is the true climax and Spohr has come as near to being heroic here as his nature will allow.

The finale came in the nature of an anti-climax; a funeral theme is treated at some length and then a long portrayal of "Consolation in Tears" follows, with the same reiteration that has characterized the first movement. It was all finely played, but we fear that the symphonies of Spohr are as hopelessly antiquated as the novels of Richardson. The fact that Spohr chose to copy Haydn and Mozart and to despise Beethoven tells against him now. That he had some real desire for dramatic effects, however, is shown by his appreciation of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Ben Davies was the vocalist of the concert and appeared in the second number with "Waft her, angels," which he sang very finely, with sturdy voice, excellent phrasing, clear enunciation, and commendable dramatic effect. He deserved the hearty applause that he won in this number. Not so in the second number! This was Cowen's "Dream of Endymion." Judging by the results, there is not a doubt but that Endymion had eaten mince pie and lobster salad just before going to sleep. There is no denying the fervor of this work: Cowen has pumped it in most laboriously; the thermometer is continuously at 110 in the shade; but it remains as conventional as a book of etiquette; it reminds one of Heine's little tailor who lay abed, perspiring, and dreamed of the Queen of Sheba. It is difficult to speak calmly of such weak stuff, and when one thinks of the poetic height which Cowen attained in his Scandinavian symphony, one can only be astonished the more. The ecstatic orchestration of the work may be characterized as Wagner-and-water.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," has not been heard in the city for a long while. It was given in the old Philharmonic days, when Boston's orchestral music, Heavenly maid, was young, and was conducted by Bernard Listemann. This work trots out one of the best steeds in the musical stable. In this stable there stand Grane, the Walkyrian stud, Mephistopheles' pair of blacks, of the Avernian line, and the spirited charger owned and driven by Lenore's lover.

The work is not as effective as some of the "Poemes Symphoniques," but is none the less an exciting and brilliant number. The ride itself is not comparable to Berlioz's "Ride to Hades" in graphic effect, but the bold start of the composition, with cymbal clash, the death of the steed, and above all, the savagery and Orientalism of the final triumph, are thrilling touches. One could not help comparing this torrent of military ardor, with the tepid martial touches of Spohr, which had preceded; the contrast was marked even in the fanfares which occurred copiously in both compositions. The Liszt work was performed with tremendous spirit and power.

The concert ended with Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman." The reading was a fine one, and the struggle between the fierce motive which represented the Dutchman and the tender phrase which portrayed Senta and the salvation of the hero, was admirably delineated. Altogether the programme was one of sustained interest even if some of the numbers were unequal in merit.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII, NO. 112.
SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Melodious Spohr Symphony Is Heard Again Here.

It Was Read and Played with Surpassing Beauty of Style—The Liszt Symphonic Poem—Mr. Davies Contributed Two Solos—Singer Cordially Received.

The programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Symphony, "The Consecration of Tones"...Spohr
"Deeper and Deeper Still," and "Waft Her, Angels"........................Handel
Symphonic poem, "Mazeppa"..............Liszt
Scena, "The Dream of Endymion".........Cowen
(First time in Boston.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...Wagner

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist.

It was a pleasure to listen to the graceful and melodious Spohr symphony again; especially to the first and second movements, with their flowing harmonies and their exquisite instrumentation. The third movement has taken on something of the aspect of banality, and the finale of garrulity, but there are charming moments even in them of delightful tone-color, vigorous dramatic power and splendor of treatment.

It seems curious, in this era of extreme eccentricity in modulation, that this work should have been attacked, when it was new, for its persistent chromatic harmonies, for now there is scarcely an ambitious song that does not eclipse it in this regard. It was read and played last evening with surpassing beauty of style.

The Liszt symphonic poem is chiefly interesting for the solidity, the richness and the effectiveness of its orchestration. Otherwise, it is notable only for its brilliant incoherency and its oscillations between blatant pretentiousness and poorly disguised commonplace. However, if Liszt may not be accorded a place among the composers of truly great orchestral works, his command over instrumental color falls little, if at all, behind that of Wagner himself, and in this work, which was given with magnificent fire and emphasis, his skill in this direction is exemplified with noble impressiveness.

Mr Davies, who was welcomed with great cordiality, sang his two solos with that perfection of artistic phrasing, that smoothness, justness of expression and thorough musical skill that have always so satisfyingly distinguished his work. His voice is much worn, and has become veiled, but his singing was still interesting for its mastery of style. But why did he sing that tiresome Cowen aria with its brummagem pathos, its roaring amativeness, and its extravagant absurdity? Endymion's dream? The young man was not dreaming, but was afflicted with a cruel attack of nightmare, the result, probably, of overmuch reflection on the Wagnerian opera plots of his day.

The programme for the next and last Symphony concert of the season is: Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Beethoven; Quintet, from "Cosi fan tutte," Mozart; and Ninth symphony, Beethoven. The soloists are to be Mme. De Vere Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Ben Davies and Mr. Herbert Witherspoon. The chorus will consist of members of the Cecilia.

There was a time a few years ago when the good Bostonian would have felt sentimental and sorry enough to say farewell to Music Hall. It will be remembered he had conniption fits when the coming change was first broached, but now he is entirely resigned at parting with the old hall that has worn its reputation out. The wisdom of this natural order of things is manifest in the ease with which the public lets go its old associations and adopts the new. It is true Music Hall is reeking with the germ association. The music microbe must be plastered thick on its walls, and ghosts must often occupy the familiar seats where so often in the flesh they listened to the eternal programmes, and dilated with the eternal emotions. In 40 years, fancy the amount. But Boston in all its sects and classes has taken part in a vast number of events which make this hall memorable. During the final Symphony concerts many an old patron has wondered how the new temple of art would seem to him, and if he should not miss the bad air and draughts of the grimy, half-lighted barn he once deemed "the best music hall in the country!" Dear, dear, let us sit tight this week, then, for if nothing earthquaky happens we shall be hearing the Symphony orchestra playing out on Huntington avenue next season.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 21, 1900.

"All things come round to him who will but wait," saith the proverb; and so Liszt's wild symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," produced in London at the end of 1876, has at last reached Boston, having been placed as the central number and novelty of the twenty-third Symphony programme. Liszt knew the story of what happened

"After dread Pultowa's day,
When fortune left the royal Swede,"

not directly from Byron's poem, from which schoolboys used to declaim and Adah Isaacs Menken to derive her most famous impersonation, but instead through the medium of Victor Hugo's version, which was meant more to portray the victory and apotheosis of genius developed through suffering than the three days' agonizing experiences of a rash young gentleman who had drawn upon his defenceless head the wrath of the jealous and cruel Tartar lord. Yet the shifting trend of the music indicates well enough the greater episodes in the flight of "that Tartar of the Ukraine Breed," which fled across desert steppes to fall dead with its perishing burden still pinioned to its back amid its amazed and horrified brethren of the wild and wandering herds. The beginning is made in a dashing allegro which passes into an andante when the desperate flight is finished and the steed drops lifeless; then when rescue, relief and restoration come, the allagro marziale of a triumphant march succeeds ringing out bold Cossack strains in melodies of the Ukraine. The composition is most involved and difficult, and often takes on the character of wild rhapsody, far exceeding the usual reasonable limitations of the symphonic poem. Indeed a criticism of that earlier time declares that "a more incoherent series of ravings never were constructed for the torment of mankind." But in a generation mankind has heard a good deal and become used to a good deal which would have been accounted unbearable even less than thirty years ago; and the Music Hall audience, although pronouncing "Mazeppa" more trying and perplexing than the "Preludes" appeared on its introduction, yet managed to get satisfaction as well as surprise from it and to be able to appreciate and admire the superb skill, the fire, the rush, the strength and the strange effectiveness which Mr. Gericke and the orchestra imparted to the exacting score. The programme began with a noble and symmetrical reading of Spohr's most successful symphony "The Consecration of Tones," the subtitle of which is "A Characteristic Tone Painting in the form of a Symphony," after a poem by Carl Pfeiffer.

The four movements fully illustrate the poem, as well as the grace, power and poetic feeling of the composer.

Mr. Ben Davies was the soloist and in the recitative and aria from Handel's "Jephthah," as in the scene "The Dream of Endymion" by Cowen, used his fine voice to bring out the beauty of the music.

The latter number, principally in recitative, was well orchestrated; indeed the interest seemed to centre in the orchestra, since the voice, used principally for declamation, could not have the melodic charm which is its right.

The concert closed with the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," given with a fire and precision quite electrifying.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1900.

An Old Symphony of Spohr Resurrected for the Amusement of a Nervous Generation—Messrs. de Pachmann, Marteau and Miles Gave Much Pleasure in the Afternoon.

The program of the 23d symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Symphony No. 4, in F major, "The Consecration of Tones" ....Spohr
Recitative, "Deeper and and deeper still," and aria, "Waft her, angels," from Jephthah" ....Handel
Symphonic Poem No. 6, "Mazeppa"....Liszt
Scena, "The Dream of Endymion".....Cowen
(First time in Boston.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman,"..Wagner

Spohr liked his fourth symphony. He admitted this himself in his naive autobiography. He talked about the success at the first performance, and the popularity of the work in other cities and succeeding years. Perhaps it was worth while to play it in the year 1900, so as to show how easily audiences now tucked snugly under ground were pleased. The last time I heard this music that is supposed to depict "the rigid silence of Nature before the Creation of Tone" and other things was in London. Arthur Sullivan conducted. He sat in a chair and kept dropping his monocle. And the band played on. I am not sure but that his method of conducting was peculiarly appropriate to this symphony, which in the finale finds "consolation in tears."

"Mazeppa" is a decided contrast, but in spite of its bombast and pother it is not much better music, and it is singularly ineffective, although you see Liszt laboring over it like "a tanned galley-slave chained to the oar." The ride, so far as pictorial music is concerned, has been much better done by Berlioz, Wagner and Saint-Saëns, and the march with the final apotheosic soon becomes tiresome, and is weakest where it should be strongest.

Mr. Ben Davies first appeared at a Symphony concert April 11, 1896, and he sang "Waft her, angels." He appeared April 3, 1897, and he sang "Waft her, angels." He appeared again last night, and he sang "Waft her, angels." Is his concert repertory so small? Or is this air the one thing he loves in music and thinks he sings the best? The years have used their envious teeth on his voice, which is neither as clear nor as responsive to his will as in 1896. His delivery of the recitative was at times singular in the matter of punctuation, and he made a nice distinction between "me brain" and "my breast." His second piece was "The Dream of Endymion," by Cowen. It was first sung by him at a Philharmonic concert, London, June 17, 1897. The poem, which is of a pleasingly erotic nature, was written by Mr. Joseph Bennett. As Mr. Bennett is by profession a music critic, all that he does is of course good. But Mr. Cowen—oh, Mr. Cowen! When this piece was first sung in London, the Musical Times, which, by the way, is edited by Mr. Bennett, pronounced the music "equally good in its passionate and languorous passages." It is equally good—that is to say equally bad. The melody is pointless and without distinction of any kind; the structure of the piece is without backbone, and the diluted spirits of Wagner, injected as with a hypodormic syringe, do not awaken the thing to even temporary life. Mr. Davies sang as though he really believed in the music; he sang it with all his strength.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 22, 1900.

Ben Davies Sings With the Symphony Orchestra.

Last week's symphony program included Spohr's symphony, "Consecration of Tones," Liszt's symphonic poem "Mazeppa," the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and arias by Handel and Cowen, the latter numbers introducing Mr Ben Davies as soloist. In the recitative and aria from Handel's "Jephtha," Mr Davies again demonstrated his grand abilities as an interpreter of oratorio music, and the two excerpts were sung with the usual fervor and beauty of expression with which concert patrons have so long associated this exponent of ecclesiastic music. In the aria, "Waft Her, Angels," the runs were voiced with a purity of intonation and a flexibility seldom heard in a tenor robusto. The scena from Cowen's "Dream of Endymion" was sung by Mr Davies for the first time in Boston. The romantic theme of the text and the setting were each well suited to the artist's style of work, and the sympathetic treatment of the scene was a splendid example of the noble qualities of Mr Davies' art. His voice was in admirable form, and except in a very few phrases where the fortissimo was long sustained the purity and resonance was all that could be desired. His tonal coloring was perfect and not unduly contrasted, while every phrase of the music was given its relative and proper value. After each number the artist was rapturously applauded and recalled to the platform. The orchestral background was inspiring, the accompaniments being played with a beautiful effect which at no time subordinated the work of the soloist.

Spohr's "tone poem" is a piece of descriptive writing whose difficulties are a bar to its frequent performance, and the grace and symmetry of the instrumental score is so marked that an orchestra of the highest skill is required to bring out even the more obvious beauties of the work. The four movements are quite irregular in form, and the themes range from "rigid silence in nature" to a crade song and war and funeral music. It is musical poetry of unlimited latitude, with each subject and division of subjects treated in the masterly style of Spohr. The orchestra has not given a finer example this season of its timbre than in the performance of this work, and as every contingent finds its "work laid out" in the score, general praise for each one will tell the story of the whole. In the second part the near approach to a solo by the cello warrants a special word of commendation for Mr Schroeder's contribution.

The Liszt "Mazeppa" poem was given with magnificent vigor and dash, the weird effects, rush and turmoil of the orchestration being presented in a manner thoroughly typical of the subject, that of Mazeppa's mad ride while strapped to the back of a wild horse. The closing number, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," received a sympathetic rendering, although the brasses in a few instances were not very certain in their utterances.

The program this week for the closing concerts of the season will comprise Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 2, and the ninth symphony and the quintet from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte." The soloists will be Mme de Vere-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr Ben Davies and Mr Herbert Witherspoon. The chorus will be from the Cecelia club.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 23, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-third symphony concert brought the following programme on Saturday evening, in the Music Hall:

Spohr: Symphony No. 4, in F major, "Die Weihe der Töne," opus 86.
Handel: Recitative, "Deeper and deeper still," and Air, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephthah."
Liszt: Symphonic Poem No. 6, "Mazeppa."
Cowen: Scena, "The Dream of Endymion."
Wagner: Overture to "Der fliegende Holländer."
Mr. Ben Davies was the singer.

To hear Spohr's "Weihe der Töne" in this year of grace 1900 is a curious experience. Some of it sounds perhaps better than it used to in the old days; much of it, far worse. There is nothing in Spohr's chromatics to frighten anyone nowadays; neither does his often unquestionably dramatic touch seem as operatic as it once did. The first two movements in the symphony are still charming, full of genial, melodic invention and harmonic beauty, and exquisitely scored. The march has a certain sombre dignity—the instrumentation is, by the way, surprisingly like Spontini's—and the expressiveness of the passage descriptive of the "feelings of those left behind" calls for hearty admiration. Spohr's conception here is really remarkable; the dominant emotion is neither of grief nor despair; it is a gloomy sort of restlessness and anxiety, a seeking relief in Schiller's

Beschäftigung, die nie ermattet,
Die langsam schafft, doch nie zerstört,
Die zu dem Bau der Ewigkeiten
Zwar Sandkorn nur fur Sandkorn reicht,
Doch von der grossen Schuld der Zeiten
Minuten, Tage, Jahre streicht.

The music expresses this far better and more keenly than it is expressed in Liszt's "Ideale." Upon the whole, Spohr had more brains and poetic perception than musically creative genius! But, when that Ambrosian song of Thanksgiving comes, with its mock-Handelian counterpoint, Oh, Lord! how weak the good man is! The funeral music in the last movement has a certain thoosy-moosy sincerity; one wonders where Spohr got a chance to study some Bach cantatas; not that his treatment of the choral is at all in Bach's style, far from it, but that the interludes on the wind instruments certainly do show some reflection of Bach's feeling and expression. The concluding "Consolation in Tears" is, to me, exceedingly beautiful. The performance was ideal, Mr. Schroeder's playing of the Serenade, a perfect piece of artistry.

Liszt's "Mazeppa" is one of the most interesting looking scores I ever laid eyes on; but at performance the wonder of all those ingenious combinations vanishes, and they sound pretty much like anything else. The work is cheap and ineffectual; there is no headlong rush, the steed seems tired and panting, you feel the ever-renewing obstacle, not the forward bound; there is no triumph in the closing march, the genius does not "se relève Roi" at the end. When we think that this composition was written in the thirties, and scored in 1850, we can only stand astounded at Liszt's artistic foresight; it is more modern in spirit than anything by Berlioz or Wagner at that date—unless we except the seldom-played tomb-scene, "after Garrick," in the "Roméo et Juliette." Tchaikovsky and Rimski-Korsakoff were unknown then; yet "Mazeppa" is as modern as anything either of them has written since. Only our present Richard Strauss is more modern than this "Mazeppa!" If Liszt had had only a third of Berlioz's musical invention, what a composer he would have been! The piece was admirably played, but . . .!

Wagner's "Holländer" overture was grandly given.

Mr. Ben Davies not only has a beautiful tenor, but is a thoroughly artistic singer. He sings Handel's "Waft Her, Angels" exquisitely, as we have had pretty good opportunity for judging here in Boston, for this is the third time he has sung it at the Symphony concert. But, in heaven's name, what does the man mean by singing this song so often, so relentlessly? The days of Sims Reeves are past and gone; and remember that even he did not sing "Waft Her, Angels" all the time; he would often mercifully show a medical certificate instead. We in Boston are, to a certain extent, an oratorio-ridden community; and we do not want to hear oratorio airs at Symphony concerts; we want them kept for Sunday evenings, when we can send the guest within our walls to hear them. Handel's "Waft Her, Angels Through the Skies" is beautiful, divine, if you will; but, like other winged things, it can suffer from a too inexorable "toujours." Yet, O, the inconsistency of critical humanity! when it came to Cowen's "Dream of Endymion" I felt like crying out, "Give me some more Handelian wafting instead!" If that is the best "outsider" Mr. Davies has in his stable, heaven help us all! He sang both songs most admirably, though the orchestra accompanied the one by Handel as badly and mechanically as usual. The audience greeted the singer with warm enthusiasm.

The next, and last, programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Leonore," No. 2, opus 72; Mozart, quintet, "Di scrivermi ogni giorno," from "Cosi fan tutte;" Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D minor, "Choral," opus 125. Mme. de Vère Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Herbert Witherspoon and a chorus of members of the Cecilia will assist. W. F. A.

"This Country with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."
BOSTON EVENING RECORD.
Entered at the Post Office as second class mail matter.

Apr 23

THE SYMPHONY.

We think it was Spohr's widow who said, just after his death—"He has gone to the only place where his music can be excelled!" which epitaph was afterwards plagiarized by the widow of a pyrotechnist with—"My husband has gone to the only place where his fireworks can be excelled!" If the first remark be true, and the celestial harmony be like that of Spohr, we fear it will become tiresome before even the first 10,000 years of eternity have passed!

Spohr's symphony called "The Consecration of Tones," was the first number of the concert of Saturday. It exhibited all the merits and all the defects of the Spohr school. Spohr was supposed to be romantic because he was very chromatic in his progressions, but it took only a very few minutes to convince the auditor that something besides chromatic progressions was necessary to portray passion. The "Turmoil of the Elements" with which the symphony began, was not much more impressive than the formal and contrapuntal picture of chaos with which Haydn began his "Creation." Spohr had a great gift of repetition, and his symphony has many phrases which might be labelled—"I beg to reiterate," "As I said before," "Let me tell you once more," etc. The "Sounds of Nature" were a very diminutive "Waldesweben" with a very insistent cuckoo thrown in, and a great deal of Spohr circumlocution added. The opening movement was in good form, spite of the chaotic subjects it dealt with, and had at least the advantage of being very easily comprehended.

The second movement was throughout better, for it represented the lyric side of the evolution of tones, and Spohr had a gift of writing clear and sometimes beautiful tunes. There were three of them in this and they were in good contrast to each other. The serenade gave Mr. Schroeder an excellent violoncello obbligato which was charmingly interpreted. The mingling of the three melodies, at the close of the movement, was one of the best points of the symphony, being ingenious without exhibiting that straining for effect which often appears when the modern composers set forth their juggleries with rhythms.

In the third movement grim-visaged War began to show his wrinkled front, somewhat smoothed for the occasion by our prim composer. There were trumpet fanfares, snare-drum rolls, cymbal clashes, bass-drum poundings, etc., as the army trekked on; yet the result was not sanguinary, not the capture of even a single kopje was suggested: it was the home guards on parade, with Sousa's full band at the front. The Hymn of Thanksgiving which followed ought to have ended the work, for it is the true climax and Spohr has come as near to being heroic here as his nature will allow.

The finale came in the nature of an anti-climax; a funeral theme is treated at some length and then a long portrayal of "Consolation in Tears" follows, with the same reiteration that has characterized the first movement. It was all finely played, but we fear that the symphonies of Spohr are as hopelessly antiquated as the novels of Richardson. The fact that Spohr chose to copy Haydn and Mozart and to despise Beethoven tells against him now. That he had some real desire for dramatic effects, however, is shown by his appreciation of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman."

Mr. Ben Davies was the vocalist of the concert and appeared in the second number with "Waft her, angels," which he sang very finely, with sturdy voice, excellent phrasing, clear enunciation, and commendable dramatic effect. He deserved the hearty applause that he won in this number. Not so in the second number! This was Cowen's "Dream of Endymion." Judging by the results, there is not a doubt but that Endymion had eaten mince pie and lobster salad just before going to sleep. There is no denying the fervor of this work; Cowen has pumped it in most laboriously; the thermometer is continuously at 110 in the shade; but it remains as conventional as a book of etiquette; it reminds one of Heine's little tailor who lay abed, perspiring, and dreamed of the Queen of Sheba. It is difficult to speak calmly of such weak stuff, and when one thinks of the poetic height which Cowen attained in his Scandinavian symphony, one can only be astonished the more. The ecstatic orchestration of the work may be characterized as Wagner-and-water.

Liszt's symphonic poem, "Mazeppa," has not been heard in the city for a long while. It was given in the old Philharmonic days, when Boston's orchestral music, Heavenly maid, was young, and was conducted by Bernard Listemann. This work trots out one of the best steeds in the musical stable. In this stable there stand Grane, the Walkyrian stud, Mephistopheles' pair of blacks, of the Avernian line, and the spirited charger owned and driven by Lenore's lover.

The work is not as effective as some of the "Poemes Symphoniques," but is none the less an exciting and brilliant number. The ride itself is not comparable to Berlioz's "Ride to Hades" in graphic effect, but the bold start of the composition, with cymbal clash, the death of the steed, and above all, the savagery and Orientalism of the final triumph, are thrilling touches. One could not help comparing this torrent of military ardor, with the tepid martial touches of Spohr, which had preceded; the contrast was marked even in the fanfares which occurred copiously in both compositions. The Liszt work was performed with tremendous spirit and power.

The concert ended with Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman." The reading was a fine one, and the struggle between the fierce motive which represented the Dutchman and the tender phrase which portrayed Senta and the salvation of the hero, was admirably delineated. Altogether the programme was one of sustained interest even if some of the numbers were unequal in merit.

[illegible] 1813.
[illegible] Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
[illegible]DAY MORNING, APRIL 30, 1900.

Closing Symphony Concert—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Music Hall ended its tonal career, on Saturday night, in a blaze of glory, in which floral decorations, frenzied hurrahs, speech-making, and other unusual excitement blended. Matters began auspiciously; on entering the hall the auditor found each musician's stand decorated with flowers, while the conductor's rack was covered with floral tributes, and there was a "ninth symphony audience" present, which is equivalent to saying that the hall was packed to the doors. When Mr. Gericke entered there was applause from audience and orchestra that seemed never to cease.

The programme began with Beethoven's second "Leonora" overture (which was written first) a good and dramatic beginning of an exciting concert. The Leonora overtures, Nos. 2 and 3, cannot fail to impress upon the critical listener the weakness of the plot of Beethoven's single opera; everything happens at just the proper moment, in this opera, just as it does in a "New York Ledger" story, and the trumpet calls cannot but recall to the mind the fact that if the Governor had arrived five minutes later, Florestan would have been killed and Pizarro triumphant. But Beethoven's great music makes one blind to the literary defects of "Fidelio," just as Mozart's genius was able to float the leaden libretto of "The Magic Flute."

Mozart's greatness was demonstrated in the next number of the programme, the very seldom heard quintette from "Cosi fan Tutti." Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, and Messrs. Ben Davies, Herbert Witherspoon and William W. Walker were the singers, and their voices blended admirably. The ineffable beauty of this quintette caused it to become the gem of the concert, and it seemed to accentuate the fact that direct melodic beauty is not to be despised in Music, even though such pure and intelligible progressions would be scorned by many of the modern composers.

It also demonstrated, by vivid contrast, how unvocal Beethoven was, for the suavity and delicacy of the vocalism of this quintette, and the screaming of the finale of the ninth symphony, were as far apart as the poles. An encore followed the ending of this delicious number, an encore that would not be gainsaid spite of all rules to the contrary; the applause was persistent and furious.

After this came the great "ninth!" The first movement was grandly performed, especially in that tremendous chromatic coda in which the strings and bassoons sound like the mighty serges of the ocean.

The Scherzo is rather a grotesque than a playful movement; when Beethoven was humorous it was rather with the savagery of an Aristophanes than with the wit of a Martial. But the great development of that peculiar three-noted figure which alternately chatters and thunders through the entire movement, was splendidly done, and the kettle-drum deserves a word of especial praise. How Beethoven loved this humble instrument! Already in his first symphony he liberates it from its tonic-dominant-playing bondage, in the eighth symphony he gives it comical prominence, and here in the ninth he causes the kettle-drum to converse on equal terms with its more versatile musical brethren. The bassoon, too, (Beethoven's favorite instrument when he was in lively mood) and the horn did excellent work in the performance of this movement. The Coda was made as brusque as the composer's heart could wish.

The beauty of the Adagio, with its variation of two themes, can never be exaggerated; and Beethoven was stone-deaf when he wrote it! So deaf that he could not even hear the applause that followed it! This movement is as tender as the Scherzo is bold, or the Allegro majestic; it would be impossible to find three symphonic movements in better contrast, better foils to each other, than these instrumental ones; but now the composer introduces his voices, treats them exactly as if they were clarinettes or violins, things of wood or metal and not of flesh and blood, and the result is so strained that the throats of the audience ache in sympathy with the singers.

But the instrumental part is ingenious. Note a few of the effects that are not always sufficiently dwelt upon by the commentators—Beethoven is going to sing about the millennium, the era of universal love, (he loved liberty, and that brought forth "Egmont" and the Heroic symphony, he believed in universal fraternity, and that brought forth this finale) but before he touches his happy theme he must give us the reverse of the picture, and the dissonance of the opening chords portrays all the sorrow and crime, the contention and misery of mankind.

He causes the contrabasses to rebuke the tumult, as a Redeemer might promise peace to a suffering race, and the result is a dialogue which foreshadows the entrance of the human voice for the first time in symphony, and also forms an admirable bridge to the innovation; he passes in review the themes of the preceding movements and sums up his symphony (the first time that this was ever done in Music) before he proceeds to his climax.

The contrabass phrases are considered the most important ever written for this instrument. Wagner used to rehearse his musicians to death on this particular part of the symphony, in his old Dresden days, and Mr. Gericke had not spared his men in this particular either; the result was wonderful, although we should have preferred a little slower [illegible] came [illegible] theme [illegible] the subject for stupendous variations also given by the contrabasses and 'cellos. This has been called "a mere Gassenhauer" (street-song) by a German critic, and "Glorified 'Yankee Doodle'" by an eminent Bostonian; it has been made into a hymn and one hears it in church as "Rise my Soul, and stretch they wings." It proceeds by steps, not skips, (conjunct movement) as a theme to be sung by a multitude ought to do; it comes close to that ideal multitude-melody, "God Save the Queen" in this respect.

The character of the variations shows how strenuously Beethoven was seeking for some counterpoise to the strength of the form used in the first movement of symphony, the Sonata-allegro. This latter being chiefly development of figures, Beethoven set variations as a proper foil to it. The difference between variation and development may be stated thus—variations treat the theme as a whole, development treats its separate members; Variation is to repaint, ornament and embellish the original edifice, Development is to pull it down and build a new one with its bricks.

The Cecilia chorus entered upon its herculean task with courage and confidence, and it succeeded as well as any band, short of a band of angels, could. The soloists were Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Stein, and Messrs. Davies and Witherspoon, who had done such excellent work in the infinitely more singable Mozart quintette. They did "their possible" and caught the enthusiasm of the chorus. The climax goes quite beyond the human larynx; the tenors and basses offered to kiss all the world (presumably beginning with the sopranos and altos) and all went upon that aerial excursion—"High among the star pavilions"—without actual disaster. Beethoven's deliriums of joy, as witness the end of "Fidelio," and this exciting finish, are among the impracticalities of Music; if the millennium is to be a celebration as wild as this we are certain that everybody will have a severe headache the next morning.

Having sung about the era of brotherly love, it was comparatively easy to proceed to exemplify it, and the last musical minutes in the dear old hall in which so many happy moments have been spent, and so many colds caught, were certainly out of the common. First it was Mr. Gericke; he was called for with imperious power and recalled again and again amid cheering such as might characterize a political convention just after the nomination of a popular candidate. This wild hurrahing grew to such proportions that he determined upon a manly struggle with the English language; in the combat he came off victor in a charming manner. It was delightful to witness the great affection in which the Boston public holds this conductor, and it is fully deserved, for he is one of the great orchestral leaders of the world and he it was who first set the high standard which our orchestra maintains.

After the Choryphaeus there came the Choregus, the orchestra's conductor was followed by its founder. There is no need to dilate upon Boston's debt of gratitude to Mr. H. L. Higginson; he has given our city its greatest art-enjoyment, he has elevated the musical standard of the entire country, he has won the right to a permanent place in the musical history of America. His speech was evidently quite informal, but contained some most welcome statements, among which one may mention the allusion to the fire-proof character of the new hall and the mention of Mr. Gericke's indefinite retention as conductor. He thanked the public, the musicians, the conductor, everybody except the critics, whose task is well-known to be a thankless one and therefore not to be thanked. And so, amidst a reign of excitement and enthusiasm, unparalleled at a symphony concert, the old Music Hall passes out of our musical life. There are many memories clinging around it; will not some one write its history?

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 28, 1900.

The current Symphony season ended, as several of its predecessors have done, with Beethoven's ninth symphony, which, in spite of a performance very splendid, stately, vivid and almost thrilling at times, failed as usual to arouse in the hearers the virtually unattainable full glow and uplift of that fiery and exultant enthusiasm which the composer sought to portray and to impart in his poem of the union of all voices of music in one immense pæan of joy and ascription. Of all the executants none failed to contribute in full measure of interest, effort and spirit, and a finer or more equable achievement it would be difficult to attain. The orchestra was admirably ready, adequate and responsive to Mr. Gericke's desire, the Cecilia dealt intelligently and strongly by the choruses, in which it has made good showing on other occasions, and the solo quartette, Mme. De Vere Sapio, Miss Stein and Messrs. Davies and Witherspoon, exerted themselves nobly and made some true effects, although the soprano alone has a voice sufficiently far-reaching for the highest flights of the soaring strains.

The symphony was preceded by the second "Lenore" overture, and the pretty little "Write me every day, good-bye, my beautiful idol," quintette from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," nicely sung by the same quartette and Mr. W. W. Walker.

The last season for the old Music Hall has been remarkable for the considerable number of novelties—most of them worthy—produced, as well as for the many interesting and generally very able musicians who came as strangers, no less than for the unprecedently high average of the performances in point of intelligence, animation, earnestness and technical perfection. And so farewell, "They say he made a good end on't." The season will begin in the new hall on October 20.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII, NO. 119.

SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1900.

A SYMPHONY GEM.

Fine Programme for Last Concert of Season.

Long Career of Music Hall Fittingly Terminated.

Orchestra Assisted by a Chorus and Soloists.

Splendid Rendering of the "Leonore" Overture.

Fascinating Mozart Quintet Charmingly Sung.

THE 24th and last concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Overture, "Leonore," No 2.........Beethoven
Quintet from "Cosi Fan Tutte".........Mozart
Symphony No. 9..................Beethoven

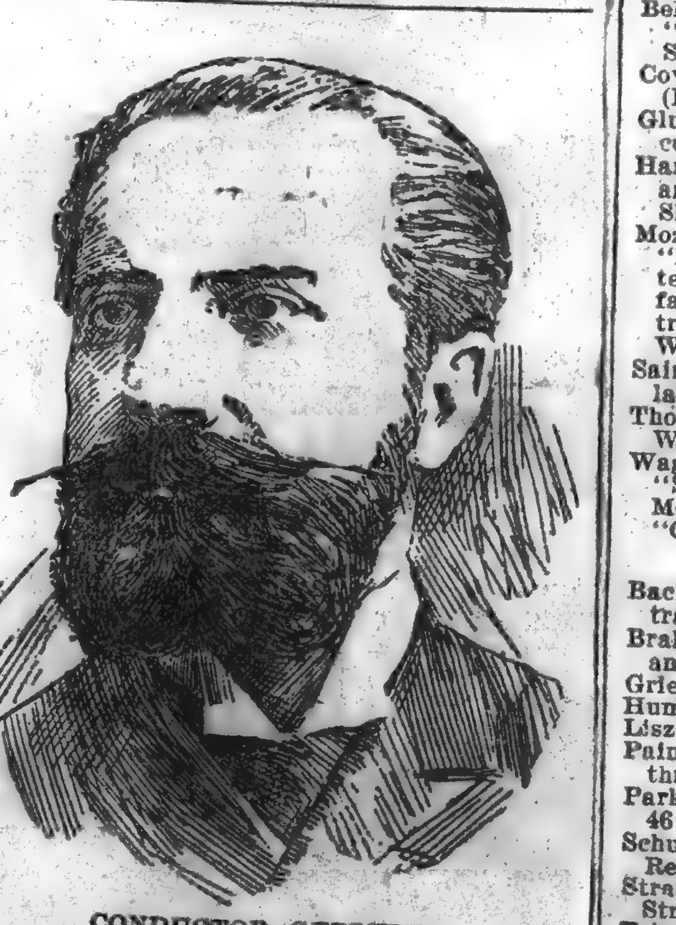
The assisting artists were Mme. De Vere-Sapio, soprano; Miss Gertrude May Stein, contralto; Mr. Ben Davies, tenor; Mr. Herbert Witherspoon, bass, and a chorus consisting of members of the Cecilia.

The stated programme ended the season, and at the same time closed the long career of Music Hall in its aspect as the home of the highest form of orchestral and of choral performances, in a fitting manner.

There was an enormous audience, every available spot in the auditorium having its occupant. There were the time-honored demonstrations that have always attended the last nights of the Symphony season. Mr. Gericke, on his first appearance was received with tumultuous applause, that was prolonged until he had bowed his acknowledgments many times; and when all was over there was a leave-taking in which he was recalled with a like hearty favor.

The orchestra throughout the whole evening displayed its splendid efficiency at its very best. The rarely given "Leonore" overture, No. 2, was nobly read, and magnificently performed. The dainty and fascinating little Mozart quintet was charmingly sung, and was so persistently applauded that Mr. Gericke broke through his rigid objection to encores, and gratified the audience with a repetition.

The tremendous Choral symphony was read by Mr. Gericke along purely conventional lines, without any attempt to depart from traditional renderings of the work, or to follow modern methods in regard to intensifying its sentiment or emphasizing its color. In fact, his reverence for the composer was so deep, and his reserve so absolute that it seemed, now and then, as if he might have relaxed the conscientious restraint he steadily observed, without doing any very great violence to the classical spirit in which he interpreted the work as a whole.



CONDUCTOR GERICKE.

At every stage, however, it showed the thoughtful conception consistently carried out, and the performance gave constant evidence of most elaborate rehearsing. The efforts of the chorus were exceptionally fine. It is seldom, indeed, that the trying and unvocal music given to it is sung with the clearness, the easy fluency and the tunefulness that marked its performance on this occasion. The brilliant female voices especially acquitted themselves with an efficiency that can scarcely be overpraised. The solos were well sung, but were no more effective than usual; while the solo quartet was as unimpressive as it always has been, and, in all likelihood, always will be.

The programmes of [illegible] of which [illegible] Wagner came [illegible] and Brahms followed with five. Mozart was represented by four and Haydn by two.

The following list, from the Symphony programme book, gives a summary of works by their class:

SYMPHONIES.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36; symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68; symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93; symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92; symphony No. 9, in D minor, "Choral," opus 125 (Clementine de Vere-Sapio, Gertrude May Stein, Ben Davies, Herbert Witherspoon, and chorus of members of the Cecilia).
Berger, Wilhelm—Symphony in B-flat major, opus 71.
Berlioz—Three movements from the dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette," opus 17.
Borodin—Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major.
Brahms—Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98; symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73; symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.
Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Glazounoff—Symphony No. 6, in C minor, opus 58
Haydn—Symphony in G major, "Oxford"; symphony in G major, "Military."
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56.
Mozart—Symphony No. 36, in C major (Koechel, No. 425); symphony No. 25, in G minor (Koechel, No. 183).
Schubert—Unfinished symphony in B minor.
Schumann—Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120; symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.
Spohr—Symphony No. 4, in F major, "Die Weihe der Tone," opus 86.
Strauss, Richard—Symphony in F minor, opus 12.
Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 3, in D major, opus 29.

SUITES AND SERENADES.

Fuchs—Serenade for string orchestra, No. 1, in D major, opus 9.
Gluck—Ballet suite No. 2 (F. A. Gevaert).
Grieg—Suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt," opus 46.
D'Indy, Vincent—"Medee," orchestral suite after Catulle Mendes' tragedy, opus 47.
Moszkowski—Suite No. 1, in F major, opus 39.
Rameau—Ballet-suite (arranged by Felix Mottl).
Rimski-Korsakoff—"Scheherazade," symphonic suite after "The Arabian Nights," opus 35.

OVERTURES, PRELUDES AND SYMPHONIC POEMS.

Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," opus 84; overture to "Lenore," No. 1, opus 138; overture to "Lenore," No. 2, opus 72.
Berlioz—Overture to "Le Roi Lear," opus 4.
Brahms—Tragische ouverture, opus 81.
Chadwick—"Adonais," elegiac overture (MS.).
Draesecke, Felix—Jubel-Ouverture.
Dvorak—Symphonic poem, "Heldenlied," opus 111.
Franck—Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides."
Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" (Coda by Wagner).
Goldmark, Karl—Overture to the "Prometheus Bound" of Aeschylus, opus 38; overture, "Sappho," opus 44.
Goldmark, Rubin—Overture to "Hiawatha" (MS.).
Liszt—Symphonic poem No. 6, "Mazeppa."
Marschner—Overture to "Hans Heiling," opus 80.
Mendelssohn—Overture. "Zum Mahrchen von der Schonen Melusine," opus 32.
Schubert—Overture in the Italian style, in C major, opus 170; overture to "Alfonso und Estrella," opus 69.
Smetana—Overture to "Prodana Nevesta."
Strauss, Richard—Symphonic poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," opus 30.
Tchaikovsky—"Hamlet," fantasy-overture, opus 67.
Wagner, Richard—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"; prelude to "Parsifal"; overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander."
Wagner, Siegfried—Overture to "Der Barenhauter."
Weber—Overture to "Oberon."

CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS.

Arenski, Anton—Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, opus 3. (Katherine Ruth Heyman.)
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A.—Concerto for pianoforte, in C-sharp minor, opus 45. (Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.)
Beethoven—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73. (Ignace J. Paderewski.)
Concert for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58. (Ernst von Dohanyi.)
Dvorak—Concerto for violoncello, in B minor, opus 104. (Alwin Schroeder.)
Grieg—Concerto for pianoforte, in A major, opus 16. (Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.)
Lalo—Symphonie espagnole, for violin and orchestra, opus 21. (Timothee Adamowski.) Concerto for violoncello, in D minor. (Elsa Rueger.)
Loeffler—"Les Veillees de l'Ukraine," for violin and orchestra. (Franz Kneisel.)
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin, in E minor, opus 64. (Leonora Jackson.)
Rubinstein—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70. (Mark Hambourg.)
Schutt, Eduard—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 47. (Ludwig Breitner.)
Tchaikovsky—Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, opus 35. (Alexandre Petschnikoff.)

SCENAS, ARIAS, ETC., WITH ORCHESTRA.

Beethoven—Recitative, "Abscheulicher!" and aria "Komm Hoffnung," from "Fidelio," opus 72. (Milka Ternina.)
Bellini—Recitative, "Sediziose voci," and aria, "Casta Diva," from "Norma." (Marcella Sembrich.)
Cowen—"The Dream of Endymion," scena. (Ben Davies.)
Gluck—Air, "Divinites du Styx," from "Alceste." (Clara Butt.)
Handel—Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and air, "Waft Her, Angels, Through the Skies," from "Jephthah." (Ben Davies.)
Mozart—Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from "Il Seraglio." (Marcella Sembrich.) Quintet "Di scrivermi ogni giorno," from "Cosi fan tuute." (Clementine de Vere-Sapio, Gertrude May Stein, Ben Davies, William W. Walker, Herbert Witherspoon.)
Saint-Saens—"La fiancee du timbalier," ballad with orchestra, opus 82. (Marie Brema.)
Thomas, A. Goring—Song, "My Heart Is Weary," from "Nadeshda." (Clara Butt.)
Wagner, Richard—Two songs with orchestra, "Schmerzen, "Traume" (scored by Felix Mottl). (Marie Brema.) Closing scene from "Gotterdammerung." (Milka Ternina.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Bach—Chaconne in D minor (scored for orchestra by Raff).
Brahms—Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 (scored by Brahms and Parlow).
Grieg—Symphonische tanze, opus 64.
Humperdinck—Maurische rhapsodie.
Liszt—Rhapsodie hongroise, No. 1 in F.
Paine—Ballet music from the opera "Azara"; three Moorish dances.
Parker, Horatio W.—A northern ballad, opus 46 (MS.).
Schumann—"Bilder aus Osten" (scored by Reinecke).
Strauss—Richard—"Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche," opus 28.
Tchaikovsky—Capriccio Italien, opus 45.
Wagner, Richard—Prelude to Act III., dance of apprentices, procession of the master singers, and song of greeting to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Siegfried Idyll.

The new works presented were, alphabetically according to composers: Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, opus 3, by Anton Arenski; concerto in C sharp minor, opus 45, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; symphony in B flat major, opus 71, by Wilhelm Beyer; overture, "Adonais," G. W. Chadwick; "Jubilee" overture, Felix Draesecke; symphonic poem, "Heldenlied," opus 111, Dvorak; symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," Cesar Franck, symphony No. 6, in C minor, opus 58, Glazounoff; overture, "Hiawatha," Rubin Goldmark; symphonic dances, opus 64, Grieg; "Moorish Rhapsody," Humperdinck; orchestral suite, "Medee," Vincent d'Indy; ballet music from the opera, "Azara," J. K. Paine; "A Northern Ballad," opus 46, H. W. Parker; overture, "Der Baerenhaeuter," Siegfried Wagner. The 20th season of the Boston Symphony orchesrt will open, with Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor, in the new Music Hall, Saturday evening, Oct. 20.

ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 30, 1900.

Closing Symphony Concert—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Music Hall ended its tonal career, on Saturday night, in a blaze of glory, in which floral decorations, frenzied hurrahs, speech-making, and other unusual excitement blended. Matters began auspiciously; on entering the hall the auditor found each musician's stand decorated with flowers, while the conductor's rack was covered with floral tributes, and there was a "ninth symphony audience" present, which is equivalent to saying that the hall was packed to the doors. When Mr. Gericke entered there was applause from audience and orchestra that seemed never to cease.

The programme began with Beethoven's second "Leonora" overture (which was written first) a good and dramatic beginning of an exciting concert. The Leonora overtures, Nos. 2 and 3, cannot fail to impress upon the critical listener the weakness of the plot of Beethoven's single opera; everything happens at just the proper moment, in this opera, just as it does in a "New York Ledger" story, and the trumpet calls cannot but recall to the mind the fact that if the Governor had arrived five minutes later, Florestan would have been killed and Pizarro triumphant. But Beethoven's great music makes one blind to the literary defects of "Fidelio," just as Mozart's genius was able to float the leaden libretto of "The Magic Flute."

Mozart's greatness was demonstrated in the next number of the programme, the very seldom heard quintette from "Cosi fan Tutti." Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, and Messrs. Ben Davies, Herbert Witherspoon and William W. Walker, were the singers, and their voices blended admirably. The ineffable beauty of this quintette caused it to become the gem of the concert, and it seemed to accentuate the fact that direct melodic beauty is not to be despised in Music, even though such pure and intelligible progressions would be scorned by many of the modern composers.

It also demonstrated, by vivid contrast, how unvocal Beethoven was, for the suavity and delicacy of the vocalism of this quintette, and the screaming of the finale of the ninth symphony, were as far apart as the poles. An encore followed the ending of this delicious number, an encore that would not be gainsaid spite of all rules to the contrary; the applause was persistent and furious.

After this came the great "ninth!" The first movement was grandly performed, especially in that tremendous chromatic coda in which the strings and bassoons sound like the mighty serges of the ocean.

The Scherzo is rather a grotesque than a playful movement; when Beethoven was humorous it was rather with the savagery of an Aristophanes than with the wit of a Martial. But the great development of that peculiar three-noted figure which alternately chatters and thunders through the entire movement, was splendidly done, and the kettle-drum deserves a word of especial praise. How Beethoven loved this humble instrument! Already in his first symphony he liberates it from its tonic-dominant-playing bondage, in the eighth symphony he gives it comical prominence, and here in the ninth he causes the kettle-drum to converse on equal terms with its more versatile musical brethren. The bassoon, too, (Beethoven's favorite instrument when he was in lively mood) and the horn did excellent work in the performance of this movement. The Coda was made as brusque as the composer's heart could wish.

The beauty of the Adagio, with its variation of two themes, can never be exaggerated; and Beethoven was stone-deaf when he wrote it! So deaf that he could not even hear the applause that followed it! This movement is as tender as the Scherzo is bold, or the Allegro majestic; it would be impossible to find three symphonic movements in better contrast, better foils to each other, than these instrumental ones; but now the composer introduces his voices, treats them exactly as if they were clarinettes or violins, things of wood or metal and not of flesh and blood, and the result is so strained that the throats of the audience ache in sympathy with the singers.

But the instrumental part is ingenious. Note a few of the effects that are not always sufficiently dwelt upon by the commentators—Beethoven is going to sing about the millennium, the era of universal love, (he loved liberty, and that brought forth "Egmont" and the Heroic symphony, he believed in universal fraternity, and that brought forth this finale) but before he touches his happy theme he must give us the reverse of the picture, and the dissonance of the opening chords portrays all the sorrow and crime, the contention and misery of mankind.

He causes the contrabasses to rebuke the tumult, as a Redeemer might promise peace to a suffering race, and the result is a dialogue which foreshadows the entrance of the human voice for the first time in symphony, and also forms an admirable bridge to the innovation; he passes in review the themes of the preceding movements and sums up his symphony (the first time that this was ever done in Music) before he proceeds to his climax.

The contrabass phrases are considered the most important ever written for this instrument. Wagner used to rehearse his musicians to death on this particular part of the symphony, in his old Dresden days, and Mr. Gericke had not spared his men in this particular either; the result was wonderful, although we should have preferred a little slower tempo at the first

Then came the theme itself, the subject for stupendous variations also given by the contrabasses and 'cellos. This has been called "a mere Gassenhauer" (street-song) by a German critic, and "Glorified 'Yankee Doodle'" by an eminent Bostonian; it has been made into a hymn and one hears it in church as "Rise my Soul, and stretch they wings." It proceeds by steps, not skips, (conjunct movement) as a theme to be sung by a multitude ought to do; it comes close to that ideal multitude-melody, "God Save the Queen" in this respect.

The character of the variations shows how strenuously Beethoven was seeking for some counterpoise to the strength of the form used in the first movement of symphony, the Sonata-allegro. This latter being chiefly development of figures, Beethoven set variations as a proper foil to it. The difference between variation and development may be stated thus—variations treat the theme as a whole, development treats its separate members; Variation is to repaint, ornament and embellish the original edifice, Development is to pull it down and build a new one with its bricks.

The Cecilia chorus entered upon its herculean task with courage and confidence, and it succeeded as well as any band, short of a band of angels, could. The soloists were Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Stein, and Messrs. Davies and Witherspoon, who had done such excellent work in the infinitely more singable Mozart quintette. They did "their possible" and caught the enthusiasm of the chorus. The climax goes quite beyond the human larynx; the tenors and basses offered to kiss all the world (presumably beginning with the sopranos and altos) and all went upon that aerial excursion—"High among the star pavilions"—without actual disaster. Beethoven's deliriums of joy, as witness the end of "Fidelio," and this exciting finish, are among the impracticalities of Music; if the millennium is to be a celebration as wild as this we are certain that everybody will have a severe headache the next morning.

Having sung about the era of brotherly love, it was comparatively easy to proceed to exemplify it, and the last musical minutes in the dear old hall in which so many happy moments have been spent, and so many colds caught, were certainly out of the common. First it was Mr. Gericke; he was called for with imperious power and recalled again and again amid cheering such as might characterize a political convention just after the nomination of a popular candidate. This wild hurrahing grew to such proportions that he determined upon a manly struggle with the English language; in the combat he came off victor in a charming manner. It was delightful to witness the great affection in which the Boston public holds this conductor, and it is fully deserved, for he is one of the great orchestral leaders of the world and he it was who first set the high standard which our orchestra maintains.

After the Choryphaeus there came the Choregus, the orchestra's conductor was followed by its founder. There is no need to dilate upon Boston's debt of gratitude to Mr. H. L. Higginson; he has given our city its greatest art-enjoyment, he has elevated the musical standard of the entire country, he has won the right to a permanent place in the musical history of America. His speech was evidently quite informal, but contained some most welcome statements, among which one may mention the allusion to the fire-proof character of the new hall and the mention of Mr. Gericke's indefinite retention as conductor. He thanked the public, the musicians, the conductor, everybody except the critics, whose task is well-known to be a thankless one and therefore not to be thanked. And so, amidst a reign of excitement and enthusiasm, unparalleled at a symphony concert, the old Music Hall passes out of our musical life. There are many memories clinging around it; will not some one write its history?

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. APRIL 28, 1900.

The current Symphony season ended, as several of its predecessors have done, with Beethoven's ninth symphony, which, in spite of a performance very splendid, stately, vivid and almost thrilling at times, failed as usual to arouse in the hearers the virtually unattainable full glow and uplift of that fiery and exultant enthusiasm which the composer sought to portray and to impart in his poem of the union of all voices of music in one immense pæan of joy and ascription. Of all the executants none failed to contribute in full measure of interest, effort and spirit, and a finer or more equable achievement it would be difficult to attain. The orchestra was admirably ready, adequate and responsive to Mr. Gericke's desire, the Cecilia dealt intelligently and strongly by the choruses, in which it has made good showing on other occasions, and the solo quartette, Mme. De Vere Sapio, Miss Stein and Messrs. Davies and Witherspoon, exerted themselves nobly and made some true effects, although the soprano alone has a voice sufficiently far-reaching for the highest flights of the soaring strains.

The symphony was preceded by the second "Lenore" overture, and the pretty little "Write me every day, good-bye, my beautiful idol," quintette from Mozart's "Cosi fan tutte," nicely sung by the same quartette and Mr. W. W. Walker.

The last season for the old Music Hall has been remarkable for the considerable number of novelties—most of them worthy—produced, as well as for the many interesting and generally very able musicians who came as strangers, no less than for the unprecedently high average of the performances in point of intelligence, animation, earnestness and technical perfection. And so farewell, "They say he made a good end on't." The season will begin in the new hall on October 20.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 119.
SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1900.

A SYMPHONY GEM.

Fine Programme for Last Concert of Season.

Long Career of Music Hall Fittingly Terminated.

Orchestra Assisted by a Chorus and Soloists.

Splendid Rendering of the "Leonore" Overture.

Fascinating Mozart Quintet Charmingly Sung.

THE 24th and last concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Overture, "Leonore," No 2	Beethoven
Quintet from "Cosi Fan Tutte"	Mozart
Symphony No. 9	Beethoven

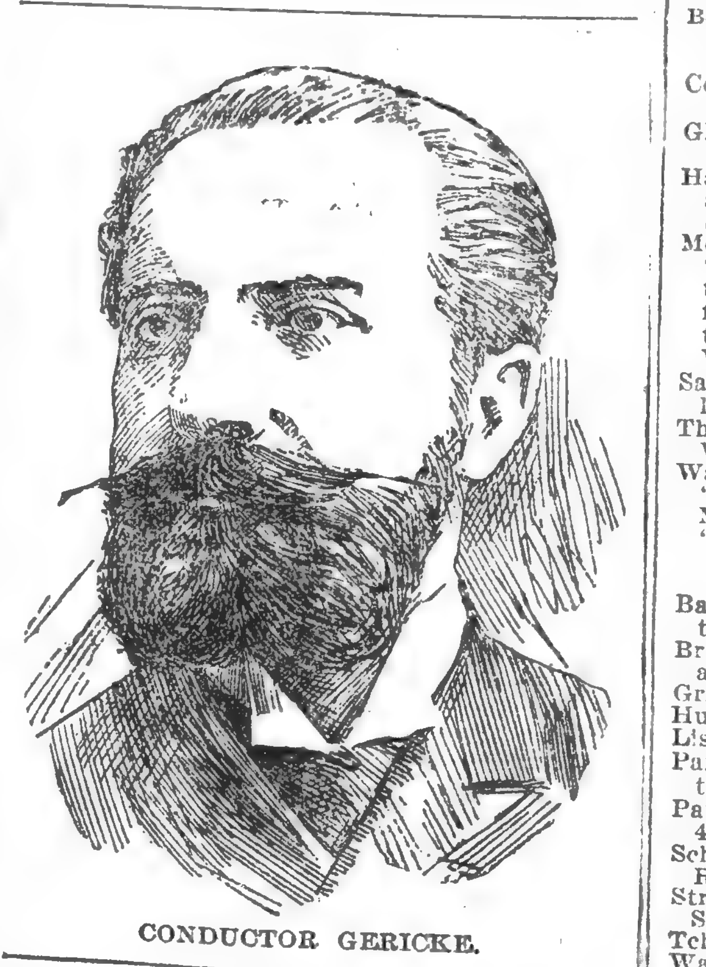
The assisting artists were Mme. De Vere-Sapio, soprano; Miss Gertrude May Stein, contralto; Mr. Ben Davies, tenor; Mr. Herbert Witherspoon, bass, and a chorus consisting of members of the Cecilia.

The stated programme ended the season, and at the same time closed the long career of Music Hall in its aspect as the home of the highest form of orchestral and of choral performances, in a fitting manner.

There was an enormous audience, every available spot in the auditorium having its occupant. There were the time-honored demonstrations that have always attended the last nights of the Symphony season. Mr. Gericke, on his first appearance was received with tumultuous applause, that was prolonged until he had bowed his acknowledgments many times; and when all was over there was a leave-taking in which he was recalled with a like hearty favor.

The orchestra throughout the whole evening displayed its splendid efficiency at its very best. The rarely given "Leonore" overture, No. 2, was nobly read, and magnificently performed. The dainty and fascinating little Mozart quintet was charmingly sung, and was so persistently applauded that Mr. Gericke broke through his rigid objection to encores, and gratified the audience with a repetition.

The tremendous Choral symphony was read by Mr. Gericke along purely conventional lines, without any attempt to depart from traditional renderings of the work, or to follow modern methods in regard to intensifying its sentiment or emphasizing its color. In fact, his reverence for the composer was so deep, and his reserve so absolute that it seemed, now and then, as if he might have relaxed the conscientious restraint he steadily observed, without doing any very great violence to the classical spirit in which he interpreted the work as a whole.



CONDUCTOR GERICKE.

At every stage, however, it showed the thoughtful conception consistently carried out, and the performance gave constant evidence of most elaborate rehearsing. The efforts of the chorus were exceptionally fine. It is seldom, indeed, that the trying and unvocal music given to it is sung with the clearness, the easy fluency and the tunefulness that marked its performance on this occasion. The brilliant female voices especially acquitted themselves with an efficiency that can scarcely be overpraised. The solos were well sung, but were no more effective than usual; while the solo quartet was as unimpressive as it always has been, and, in all likelihood, always will be.

The programmes of the season presented 48 composers and 94 compositions, of which latter Beethoven led with 11, Wagner came next with eight, and Brahms followed with five. Mozart was represented by four and Haydn by two. The following list, from the Symphony programme book, gives a summary of works by their class:

SYMPHONIES.

Beethoven—Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36; symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68; symphony No. 8, in F major, opus 93; symphony No. 7, in A major, opus 92; symphony No. 9, in D minor, "Choral," opus 125 (Clementine de Vere-Sapio, Gertrude May Stein, Ben Davies, Herbert Witherspoon, and chorus of members of the Cecilia).
Berger, Wilhelm—Symphony in B-flat major, opus 71.
Berlioz—Three movements from the dramatic symphony, "Romeo et Juliette," opus 17.
Borodin—Symphony No. 1, in E-flat major.
Brahms—Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98; symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 75; symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68.
Franck—Symphony in D minor.
Glazounoff—Symphony No. 6, in C minor, opus 58
Haydn—Symphony in G major, "Oxford"; symphony in G major, "Military."
Mendelssohn—Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," opus 56.
Mozart—Symphony No. 36, in C major (Koechel, No. 425); symphony No. 25, in G minor (Koechel, No. 183).
Schubert—Unfinished symphony in B minor.
Schumann—Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120; symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.
Spohr—Symphony No. 4, in F major, "Die Weihe der Tone," opus 86.
Strauss, Richard—Symphony in F minor, opus 12.
Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 3, in D major, opus 29.

SUITES AND SERENADES.

Fuchs—Serenade for string orchestra, No. 1, in D major, opus 9.
Gluck—Ballet suite No. 2 (F. A. Gevaert).
Grieg—Suite No. 1 from the music to "Peer Gynt," opus 46.
D'Indy, Vincent—"Medee," orchestral suite after Catulle Mendes' tragedy, opus 47.
Moszkowski—Suite No. 1, in F major, opus 39.
Rameau—Ballet-suite (arranged by Felix Mottl).
Rimski-Korsakoff—"Scheherazade," symphonic suite after "The Arabian Nights," opus 35.

OVERTURES, PRELUDES AND SYMPHONIC POEMS.

Beethoven—Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," opus 84; overture to "Lenore," No. 1, opus 138; overture to "Lenore," No. 2, opus 72.
Berlioz—Overture to "Le Roi Lear," opus 4.
Brahms—Tragische ouverture, opus 81.
Chadwick—"Adonais," elegiac overture (MS.).
Draesecke, Felix—Jubel-Ouverture.
Dvorak—Symphonic poem, "Heldenlied," opus 111.
Franck—Symphonic poem, "Les Eolides."
Gluck—Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" (Coda by Wagner).
Goldmark, Karl—Overture to the "Prometheus Bound" of Aeschylus, opus 38; overture, "Sappho," opus 44.
Goldmark, Rubin—Overture to "Hiawatha" (MS.).
Liszt—Symphonic poem No. 6, "Mazeppa."
Marschner—Overture to "Hans Heiling," opus 80.
Mendelssohn—Overture. "Zum Mahrchen von der Schonen Melusine," opus 32.
Schubert—Overture in the Italian style, in C major, opus 170; overture to "Alfonso und Estrella," opus 69.
Smetana—Overture to "Prodana Nevesta."
Strauss, Richard—Symphonic poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra." opus 30.
Tchaikovsky—"Hamlet," fantasy-overture, opus 67.
Wagner, Richard—Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg"; prelude to "Parsifal"; overture to "Der Fliegende Hollander."
Wagner, Siegfried—Overture to "Der Barenhauter."
Weber—Overture to "Oberon."

CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS.

Arenski, Anton—Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, opus 3. (Katherine Ruth Heyman.)
Beach, Mrs. H. H. A.—Concerto for pianoforte, in C-sharp minor, opus 45. (Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.)
Beethoven—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73. (Ignace J. Paderewski.)
Concert for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58. (Ernst von Dohanyi.)
Dvorak—Concerto for violoncello, in B minor, opus 104. (Alwin Schroeder.)
Grieg—Concerto for pianoforte, in A major, opus 16. (Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler.)
Lalo—Symphonie espagnole, for violin and orchestra, opus 21. (Timothee Adamowski.) Concerto for violoncello, in D minor. (Elsa Rueger.)
Loeffler—"Les Veillees de l'Ukraine," for violin and orchestra. (Franz Kneisel.)
Mendelssohn—Concerto for violin, in E minor, opus 64. (Leonora Jackson.)
Rubinstein—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70. (Mark Hambourg.)
Schutt, Eduard—Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 47. (Ludwig Breitner.)
Tchaikovsky—Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, opus 35. (Alexandre Petschnikoff.)

SCENAS, ARIAS, ETC., WITH ORCHESTRA.

Beethoven—Recitative, "Abscheulicher!" and aria "Komm Hoffnung," from "Fidelio," opus 72. (Milka Ternina.)
Bellini—Recitative, "Sediziose voci," and aria, "Casta Diva," from "Norma." (Marcella Sembrich.)
Cowen—"The Dream of Endymion," scena. (Ben Davies.)
Gluck—Air, "Divinites du Styx," from "Alceste." (Clara Butt.)
Handel—Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and air, "Waft Her, Angels, Through the Skies," from "Jephthah." (Ben Davies.)
Mozart—Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from "Il Seraglio." (Marcella Sembrich.) Quintet "Di scrivermi ogni giorno," from "Cosi fan tuute." (Clementine de Vere-Sapio, Gertrude May Stein, Ben Davies, William W. Walker, Herbert Witherspoon.)
Saint-Saens—"La fiancee du timbalier," ballad with orchestra, opus 82. (Marie Brema.)
Thomas, A. Goring—Song, "My Heart Is Weary," from "Nadeshda." (Clara Butt.)
Wagner, Richard—Two songs with orchestra, "Schmerzen, "Traume" (scored by Felix Mottl). (Marie Brema.) Closing scene from "Gotterdammerung." (Milka Ternina.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Bach—Chaconne in D minor (scored for orchestra by Raff).
Brahms—Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 3 (scored by Brahms and Parlow).
Grieg—Symphonische tanze, opus 64.
Humperdinck—Maurische rhapsodie.
Liszt—Rhapsodie hongroise, No. 1 in F.
Paine—Ballet music from the opera "Azara"; three Moorish dances.
Parker, Horatio W.—A northern ballad, opus 46 (MS.).
Schumann—"Bilder aus Osten" (scored by Reinecke).
Strauss—Richard—"Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche," opus 28.
Tchaikovsky—Capriccio Italien, opus 45.
Wagner, Richard—Prelude to Act III., dance of apprentices, procession of the master singers, and song of greeting to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg." Siegfried Idyll.

The new works presented were, alphabetically according to composers: Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, opus 3, by Anton Arenski; concerto in C sharp minor, opus 45, by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach; symphony in B flat major, opus 71, by Wilhelm Beyer; overture, "Adonais," G. W. Chadwick; "Jubilee" overture, Felix Draesecke; symphonic poem, "Heldenlied," opus 111, Dvorak; symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," Cesar Franck, symphony No. 6, in C minor, opus 58, Glazounoff; overture, "Hiawatha," Rubin Goldmark; symphonic dances, opus 64, Grieg; "Moorish Rhapsody," Humperdinck; orchestral suite, "Medee," Vincent d'Indy; ballet music from the opera, "Azara," J. K. Paine; "A Northern Ballad," opus 46, H. W. Parker; overture, "Der Baerenhaeuter," Siegfried Wagner. The 20th season of the Boston Symphony orchesrt will open, with Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as conductor, in the new Music Hall, Saturday evening, Oct. 20.

[illegible] was naturally for the last Symphony rehearsal of the season on Friday a crush and no end of enthusiasm. Mr. Gericke was called out three times amid storms of applause. Of the soloists, Mme. De Vere Sapio was looking extremely well in cream colored barege over white silk, with lace insertions. Her big hat was of white tulle, with black velvet bows. Miss Stein was very pretty in white embroideded crepe, the tunic edged with long fringe, and she wore a hat of yellow open work straw with black ostrich plumes. A few in the crowd whom we especially noted were Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mrs. John Fairchild, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. Franz Zerrahn, Mrs. Dudley B. Fay, Dr. Bigelow, Mrs. F. R. Spalding, Mr. E. Burlingham Hill, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. E. D. Jordan, Mrs. Gerard Bement, Mrs. George Leonard, Mrs. John L. Gardner, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. F. W. Kittridge and Miss Kittridge, Mr. and Mrs. Dana Estes, Miss Marion Jordan, Mrs. W. V. Kellen and Miss Kellen, Miss Anna Chapman and Mr. Harold [illegible].

Won't the Ninth Symphony echo in Boston's memory with many a tender thought for old Music Hall in the days to come. Somehow, those glorious shrieks of joy were a fitting farewell, and never before have they stirred musical Boston's soul so profoundly as last night. Perhaps the finest orchestra in the world was inspired to play that inspired work as they had not played it within years of recollection, or was it only imagination and a trick of sentiment that made it appear so? Vale, old Music Hall.

The Boston Traveler
Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY,
307 Washington Street.

THE SYMPHONY.

Last of These Concerts in the Old Music Hall Attracts an Immense Audience.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, twenty-fourth concert, and last in the old Music Hall. Soloists, Clementine de Vere-Sapio, Gertrude May Stein, Ben Davies, W. A. Walker and Herbert Witherspoon. The programme:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 2........Beethoven
Quintet from "Cosi Fan Tutti"........Mozart
Symphony, No. 9..................Beethoven

The farewell of the higher kinds of music to the historic old hall was impressive, and if not saddening, at least full of suggestive thoughtfulness. The audience was enormous, as might have been expected, and Mr. Gericke was the centre of its tumultuous enthusiasm. Finally the occasion became a sort of testimonial to the able conductor, wherein regret at parting with a time-honored friend seemed to fade away. The huge wreath of laurel behind and over the players; the flowers at every music desk, the crowd and the cheers, formed a scene not soon to be forgotten. It was "the king is dead; long live the king!"

The music played was appropriate enough in its way, although there must be many who believe that at least one number of somewhat more solemn character would have been fitting. However, the great "Leonore" overture, the beautiful Mozart quintet and the massive and overwhelming Ninth Symphony were entirely worthy the occasion. So delightfully was the quintet sung that the audience stormed for a repetition, and got it, Mr. Gericke evidently feeling that any such breaking of custom might "go" on the last night in Music Hall.

The symphony went with its usual heavy grandeur and power. Something more of elasticity might have been given to the first movement and more of poetry to the slow movement, but, all in all, the effect was superb. The frightfully altitudinous choral work was sung as well as possible by the Cecilia, and the soloists all acquitted themselves with distinction.

Mr. Gericke, who saw the demand, made a quaint little speech at the close, and after him Mr. Higginson talked for a few minutes on the ability of the orchestra and the conductor and the kindness of the public. Thus ended the glory of the most notable and history-making music hall Boston has had or can have.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MAY 1, 1900.

Maj. Higginson, in the course of his speech at the end of the Symphony concert Saturday night, male this remark, which, I should say, expressed the feelings common among all those who were accustomed to visit Music Hall: "I never came to Music Hall without fearing a fire—without wondering what would happen if a fire should break out. I won't have that fear in the new hall. You couldn't set fire to that no matter how hard you tried."

I happened by chance to go to the old Music Hall yesterday afternoon. The interior was already a wreck. All the statues—Beethoven and Apollo, and so forth, had been removed—to cold storage, I understand. It was told me that the old hall will be thoroughly renovated. The stage will be put at the other end of the hall, the auditorium will be rearranged, and a sumptuous new entrance constructed. It will be a first-class place of amusement—largely dramatic, they tell me.

American Art Journal.

1,929th WEEKLY ISSUE.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1900.

A SPOHR SYMPHONY.

The program for the twenty-third Boston symphony rehearsal and concert was:

Symphony No. 4, F major, op. 86, Spohr; Recitative and aria from "Jephtha," Handel; Symphonic poem No. 6, "Mazeppa," Liszt; Scena "The Dream of Endymion," F. H. Cowen; Overture, "The Flying Dutchman," Wagner. Soloist, Mr. Ben Davies.

The Spohr symphony is very pretty program music; it is graceful and melodious, but comparing it with the program-music of Liszt on the same program it seems weak and unrealistic. Liszt bellows and even when you are convinced of his vulgarity you are impressed by the noise that he makes. A modern cannot help feeling that Spohr missed his opportunity when he described "The Turmoil of the Elements" in a musical manner, and one's nerves were unstrung by waiting for the chaos of sound that never came. The second movement is charming and the third movement, with its war music, is thrilling and brilliant; but the Liszt bellow coming after it made it seem weak and ineffectual when one recalled it. Both the Spohr and the Liszt works were read in the most impressive and stirring manner by Mr. Gericke. Mr. Davies received a most hearty welcome and he sang the Handel recitative and aria with dignity and fine dramatic feeling. In the Cowen scena, a work well worth the rehearing, he was less effective; his voice seemed tired and was not always an obedient servant. He was rewarded with the heartiest applause and recalled many times.

PHILIP WOOLF, M. D.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 29, 1900.
(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

THE LAST CHORD

Workmen File Into Music Hall as "Symphony" Strains End.

"Then lay down the fiddle and the bow,
And take up the shovel and the hoe."

Scarcely had the strains of Beethoven's "Ninth Symphony" died out from Music Hall last evening when a gang of workmen began the task of tearing out the interior and making preparations for the new theatre, concert hall and what-not which is to occupy the place of the famous old structure next season.

The final concert of the nineteenth season of the Symphony Orchestra was in many respects a memorable event, for it was the last time this famous organization will ever appear in the historic house which for forty-eight years has been the centre of musical Boston.

With this in view, Conductor Gericke arranged a delightful programme, and it drew together one of the largest audiences of the season. Both singers, musicians and leader seemed to feel the sentiment of the occasion and played with unusual spirit and unction.

Mr. Gericke was repeatedly recalled, and finally was forced to make a speech, in which he thanked the audiences for its hearty appreciation, and the public of Boston for its constancy and generous support during the season.

Mr. Gericke retired amid a furore of applause, and then there were calls for Colonel Henry L. Higginson. He gave a brief resume of the history of the Symphony Orchestra, its struggles and trials and final success, and thanked the body of talented musicians, the past leaders and the present, and above all the generous public which had made these concerts possible. He, too, was vigorously applauded, and the audience with reluctance bade good-by to the old Music Hall forever.

The next Symphony concert will be held on Saturday evening, Oct. 20, with a rehearsal the afternoon before, in the new Music Hall on Huntington avenue.

The plans for the new interior of the old hall have not wholly been made, but enough has been decided upon to give an outline of what will be the ultimatum. Yesterday afternoon men were engaged in taking measurements, and at the stroke of midnight the work was begun. By tomorrow's sun the interior of the hall will present a most dilapidated appearance.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1900.

Close of Symphony Concert Season in Music Hall.

"Pops" Soon to Begin in Mechanic's Building Auditorium.

Vocal and Instrumental Recitals of the Week—Preludes and Echoes.

The concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra in old Music hall closed with the performances of last week, and when the 20th season opens next October it will be in the new Music hall, corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avs. The termination of the 19th season called forth two very large audiences and the program was as follows: Overture, No. 2, to "Leonore," Beethoven; quintet from "Cosi Fantutte," Mozart, and Beethoven's ninth symphony. The assisting chorus was composed of members of the Cecilia and the soloists were Mme de Vere-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr Ben Davies, Mr Herbert Witherspoon and Mr W. W. Walker. Aside from the choral part in the symphony the performance was of the usual merit, but in the symphony the musical stumbling blocks were in frequent evidence and soloists and chorus alike were unsatisffactory in their work. The "Leonore" overture received a sympathetic reading by Mr Gericke and the academic character of the work was admirably preserved, with all the sudden changes of key given without the modulations being too strenuous in form. The introduction was notably effective in the fortissimo passages, the great staccato chords were in perfect unison and the sighing phrases by the basses were also given in a splendid manner. The rushing strings and the trumpet calls, the pianissimo work of the wind instruments preceding the coda and the double fortissimo of the finale were also deserving of special commendation in an interpretation which was at all times most praiseworthy.

The quintet sang the brief Mozart excerpt beautifully, which, even with the repeat, was all too short. The voices of the singers blended perfectly, Mme de Vere-Sapio's soprano part being sustained with a purity of intonation which was particularly pleasing. The accompaniment by the orchestra also merits a word of praise.

The strength of the first three movements in the ninth symphony is so marked that the climax, or the fourth part, presents many impediments to a proper portrayal, as here Beethoven enlists the assistance of quartet and chorus to carry out his ideas. The demands of the last movement are so exacting that the ideal is almost impossible to attain, many of the voice parts being termed "unsingable," and they certainly appear so, if one may judge by the nonsuccess so frequent in attempts to give the choral movement satisfactorily. This movement is one of the compositions around which the din of critical and musical warfare has waged unceasingly for years, and probably will remain a bone of contention until voices are found that can compete with the orchestral part of the score—which at the present appears problematical.

While the performance of the fourth part was at times creditable to the Cecilia chorus, the general effect of the ensemble singing was not any better than on previous occasions here, and faithful and heroic efforts did not surmount vocal impossibilities. The soloists confronted their difficulties bravely, but their efforts only call for commendation in the way of attempt and not in the performance, a fault not due to their ability, but to the tasks set by the composer.

The first three movements by the orchestra were highly creditable in interpretation. The daintiness and elasticity of the second, scherzo, movement was the feature of the symphony performance, and in the adagio the work of the woodwinds was admirable every way, ranking with the strings of the second part. The applause throughout was very liberal, especially so at the close of the program, when Mr Gericke was called forward many times to bow acknowledgments from the platform.

In the summary of this season's symphony work appended to the program it is shown that 22 soloists have appeared at the concerts, four works were given for the first time anywhere and 13 works were performed for the first time in Boston. Ninety-four compositions, representing 48 authors, made up the programs, Beethoven leading with 11, followed by Richard Wagner 8, Brahms 5. Mozart and Tschaikowsky 4 each. Twenty-four symphonies were played, five of which were by Beethoven. Among the American composers were Mrs H. H. A. Beach, Chadwick, Loeffler, Paine and H. W. Parker. Ernst von Dohnanyi, pianist, made his first appearance in America at these concerts.

The Boston Symphony concerts were opened in Music hall Oct 21 and 22, 1881, with Mr Georg Henschel as director. The first number on the program was the Beethoven overture, "Dedication of the House," the other selections being from Gluck, Haydn, Schubert, Max Bruch and Weber. Miss Annie Louise Cary, the celebrated American contralto, was the soloist at these concerts, and sang an aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," and a scena from "Odysseus," by Bruch. It will be seen that Beethoven's works opened the first concert and closed the last concert by the orchestra in Music hall.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 117.

FRIDAY, APRIL 27, 1900.

The last Symphony rehearsal of the season! Cheer up, girls, there'll be others next autumn, and a rather exciting prospect it is, all things considered. But today it is farewell to the old stamping ground of Boston's musical culture, with another farewell performance tomorrow night. A sort of long drawn out leavetaking it will be, too, this snapping off of the present from a past filled with "memorable occasions." Heigho!

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL—Mornings, $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), 10 Pages $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, APRIL 26, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Orchestral Season Closed with a Brilliant Performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its 18th season of concerts in this city with the performance given in Infantry Hall last evening. A very interesting programme was offered, two of the five numbers being given here for the first time, while the others were popular favorites. The performance was of exceptional brilliancy, and aroused the audience to frequent displays of enthusiasm. German, French and English composers were represented on the evening's programme, the order of the numbers being as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in A-minor, "Scotch," op. 56........Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
  I. Andante con moto (A minor)
    Allegro un poco agitato (A minor)
  II. Vivace non troppo (F major)
  III. Adagio (A major)
  IV. Allegro vivacissimo (A minor)
    Allegro maestoso assai (A major)
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and aria, "Waft Her, Angels," from "Jephthah"............ George Frederic Handel
Ballet Suite..........Jean-Philippe Rameau
  (Edited by Felix Mottl.)
  (First time in Providence.)
  I. Menuet from "Platee": Poco maestro (E major)
  II. Musette from "Les Fetes d'Hebe": Allegretto (A major)
  III. Tambourin from "Les Fetes d'Hebe": Allegro (E minor)
Scena, "The Dream of Endymion"........ ....Frederic Hymen Cowen
  (First time in Providence.)
Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"...... ....Richard Wagner

Mendelssohn's Symphony in A minor, commonly known as the "Scotch" symphony, contains some of the best writing for orchestra which the talented composer ever put upon paper. For originality, melodiousness and what might almost be called daring, it is unexcelled by any of his other compositions. The last movement might have been penned by Wagner himself. One wonders why, in a time when the works of the latter composer were denied a hearing, and looked upon almost as the ravings of a madman, such music as this of Mendelssohn's should have been received with acclaim. It is doubtless a matter of personality. Mendelssohn was a popular idol, and whatever he did was accepted without question. Nevertheless, little that Wagner ever wrote departed farther from conventionalism than this last movement of the Scotch symphony. It is interesting to note, merely as a matter of orchestral technic, how Mendelssohn continues, without the use of any brass save the ordinary horns and trumpets, to produce about the same effects of "thickness" and volume which are such prominent features of Wagner's scoring. The second movement of this symphony is unexcelled in sheer beauty of material and construction, and altogether the work is a genuine masterpiece of the sonata form. It was played last night with rare spirit and sympathy.

The ballet suite by Rameau consists of three separate dance movements which have been scored for the modern orchestra by Mottl. Rameau is the most famous of the early French composers, and his music has all the quaintness of the olden time. It does not require a great stretch of the imagination to resurrect the gay cavaliers and the painted and powdered dames who might have danced to these very measures. But it is to be doubted if the impression would not be still stronger if the music was given in its original form. The richness and color of modern scoring, while it adds to these measures in one sense, just as surely detracts from them in another. But the number was a very interesting one, and was received with evident satisfaction.

The brilliant and picturesque overture to the "Flying Dutchman," by Richard Wagner, which was played with the utmost fire and dash, brought the last concert of the season to a close. As a suggestive piece of "programme music" even Wagner himself hardly ever wrote anything more complete or effective. The overture is always a favorite as a concert number.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Ben Davies, who gave the famous recitative and air "Waft Her, Angels," from Handel's "Jephthah," and a new concert aria by Cowen, entitled "The Dream of Endymion." It was an unusual treat to hear this sterling singer for the second time within a week. His superb rendering of the dramatic recitative and beautiful air by Handel has long been recognized, and last night he again presented it with all the resources of his unrivalled voice and supremely artistic delivery. Four recalls testified the pleasure of the audience. The aria by Cowen, the second of the evening's novelties, was also well received. It is decidedly effective, and written in that popular composer's well-known melodious and original style, but seems rather heavily scored for a solo number. A smaller voice than that of Mr. Davies could hardly deal with it successfully.

The season of concerts just closed has been one of the most interesting ever given here. For variety and interest the programmes have never been surpassed. The works of 22 composers have been presented, ranging over every school and period, while the performance has been invariably of the most brilliant and artistic character. Under Mr. Gericke's leadership the orchestra has reached a pitch of technical finish and unanimity of action which seems unsurpassable, nor should the eminently musicianly readings of this able conductor be passed by without a word of praise. It is a matter of regret that these superb performances do not attract greater audiences.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, APRIL 30, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Symphony season ended in a blaze of glory on Saturday evening, the Music Hall being packed full for the twenty-fourth and last concert. The programme was:

Beethoven: Overture to "Leonora," No. 2, in C major, opus 72.
Mozart: Quintet, "Di scrivermi ogni giorno," from "Cosi fan tutte."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor, "Choral," opus 125.

The solos were sung by Mme. Clémentine de Vère-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Herbert Witherspoon and Mr. William W. Walker; the chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

About a fortnight, or three weeks ago rumors were flitting round that Richard Strauss's "Heldenleben" would be given at this concert; no doubt the undertaking proved too much, as the concert itself would certainly have been over-long, judging from what accounts have reached us of the immense length of Strauss's latest symphonic poem. Probably we may expect the "Heldenleben" some time next season; and no one need feel any regrets at its not figuring on last Saturday evening's programme, for, had it been there, we should not have heard the "Cosi fan tutte" quintette; hearing this little gem might well console one for anything.

The second (really the first) "Leonore" overture is probably the least frequently given of the four that Beethoven wrote for his single opera. Men like Julius Rietz, Franz Lachner, and others of the Mendelssohn tail considered it the greatest of the four; but that opinion has pretty well died out by this time. After all, it is not easy to judge this No. 2 quite fairly; there is the same difficulty with it as with Wagner's song "Träume"; one cannot help comparing it with a later work, of which it was the first draught. One can hardly enter feelingly and unreservedly into its wondrous beauties, for at almost every turning one's attention is caught by its difference from, and inferiority to the No. 3. As an extendedly developed work of symphonic character and wondrous perfection of form, it surely outranks the No. 3; but, as a dramatic overture, it stands considerably behind it. It was an experiment in overture-writing that Beethoven never repeated; from its symphonic perfection he leaped, as from a spring-board, at one bound to the greater conciseness and dramatic force of the No. 3, the "Coriolan," and the "Egmont." Still the No. 2 deserves to be heard now and then, and the perfection of last Saturday's performance made it doubly worth hearing.

The quintet from "Cosi fan tutte" is one of those brief moments in which Mozart would sometimes manage to expand the full glory of his genius. Probably nowhere in all his operas do we find a more entrancing example of his incomparable ideality going hand in hand with his unerring dramatic power. The situation is essentially comic, even tragi-comic; the expression of the tearful side of the lovers' parting is to the full as true and poignant as that of the comic substratum of sarcasm which underlies the whole situation. It is perfectly, vividly true to life all through, and one of the earliest instances in lyric drama of two conflicting emotions going on at the same time. Yet such is Mozart's ideality, that, as Ambros once said of his Cherubino, in "Le Nozze di Figaro," that he had turned the salacious little rogue into a veritable cherub, he here gives us music that might be sung by the very angels themselves. The thing is so short that, at concerts, it is sung twice through without intermission; but even this could not satisfy the audience, for it had to be sung twice more. The performance was in every way a delight; not the least good part of it was the sly mock-pathos of Mr. Witherspoon's "Io crepo, se non rido!" You felt the old philosopher almost moved to tears by the self-command he exercised in not laughing.

We have had many performances of the Ninth here, but I think last Saturday evening's was, all told, decidedly the best. As last year, all the wood-wind was doubled, an enormous advantage to the score; this plan seems to me quite to solve the problem of the second theme of the scherzo; the theme is perfectly audible and effective through even the most unreserved fortissimo of the strings, and it does not entail the changes in instrumentation advocated by Wagner. I was glad, however, to see that Mr. Gericke adopted one of Wagner's suggestions, to my mind the best of all: restoring the theme of the scherzo to its original shape wherever Beethoven has timidly avoided the high B-flat of the first violins and first flute. Now that players can attack that note with entire safety, there is no sense in retaining Beethoven's altered version.

But best of all in Mr. Gericke's reading of the score is that he nowhere tends to overdo the expression of the music I was reminded of a remark of Mr Arthur Whiting's about a certain singer's singing of Brahms's "Ernste Lieder": "If he had not sung them with such enormous expression, there would not have been a dry eye in the house!" Beethoven's feeling is profound and passionate as may be, in burning intensity it yields to that of no composer who ever lived; but he does not howl. I have not studied all of his 138 opus-numbers; but in such of his works as I do know, I know only two passages in which his expression reaches a pitch of unreserved fury that cannot be overdone. These two are the Piu moto in D major, "Es schlägt der Rache Stunde," in the prison-quartet in "Fidelio," and the final Prestissimo in the Ninth Symphony. In these, singers and players may fairly do their devilmost; but elsewhere a certain noble reserve in expression is in order. Mr. Gericke's tempi were impeccable; especially fine, because so rare, was that of the slow movement; it was not too slow. In the first movement, too, he paid all due regard to the "ma non troppo" and "un poco maestoso" in Beethoven's directions, but without falling into that modern abomination, the "slow Allegro." Another bit of fine appreciativeness was his taking the first three expositions of the Joy-theme (in the strings and bassoon) just a thought slower than in the fortissimo outburst of the full orchestra; it was but a shade, but "the nuance, not the color" is the thing in beautiful art! His moderate tempo allowed you to feel the full divine beauty of that thrice-won[illegible] sharp, really an incomplete (in three parts) begins, to my mind, one of Beethoven's loftiest strokes of genius.

The orchestra played most admirably throughout; the chorus really sang the inordinately, inhumanly difficult finale, with fine, firm tone, unshaken rhythm, and, in the last Prestissimo, with due Dionysiac rage. To adopt Beethoven's own simile, the singers stopped just short of "biting their own noses!" all else they triumphantly did. I do not know when I have heard that simple, but apparently very difficult, modulation from G minor to C major, in "Why on bended knee, ye millions?" sung so smoothly and clearly; there was no doubt about the cross-related B-natural of the altos this time! The altos of the chorus did it even better than the violas and second clarinet had done it before them.

The solo quartet was the best I can remember in this city, or elsewhere. We have had the high B-natural of the polyphonic cadenza sung with more dramatic power twice before: once by Parepa, once —and even more thrillingly—by Mrs. H. M. Smith; but Mme. de Vère-Sapio sang it quite as true, if with less force, and with quite as good phrasing as they; and when have we had that transition through B minor to D major, in alto, tenor and bass, so well done before? Mr. Witherspoon seemed to me to sing the baritone recitative better than I had ever heard it; he was not frightened by that high E! he sang it freely, impressively, with effect. The only weak (or comparatively weak) doings by the quartet were in the first ensemble on "He whom happy Fate has granted," where the rhythm was a little shaky, and in the first few measures of the polyphonic cadenza, where the possibility of disaster was to be felt, although no disaster came. But, take it for all in all, it was a grand performance of a noble work.

At the close Mr. Gericke was so persistently called for that he made a little speech, which was none the less to the point for his giving up trying to express himself after one or two trials. Then Mr. Higginson was called for, paid a graceful tribute to the orchestra, the four conductors, the Cecilia, and the audience. The desks of the orchestra were prettily decorated with green and flowers, and every player had his boutonnière.

So sic transit the old Music Hall! I heard a good many people, on leaving the concert, speak feelingly about parting from an old friend. But as I have been doing my best to fight against that cave of harmony in every legitimate way in my power for hard upon thirty years, I own that I personlly do not feel in the least sentimental upon the subject. W. F. A.

Summary of the Symphony Season

In the course of the last, nineteenth, season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, ninety-four works have been given. Of these the following five were absolutely first performances:

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach: Concerto for Pianoforte in C-sharp minor, opus 45.
George W. Chadwick: "Adonais," Elegiac Overture.
Rubin Goldmark: Overture to "Hiawatha."
John K. Paine: Ballet-Music from "Azara."
Horatio W. Parker: A Northern Ballad, opus 46.

The following thirteen were given for the first time in this city:

Anton Arenski: Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor, opus 3.
Wilhelm Berger: Symphony in B-flat major, opus 71.
Cowen: "The Dream of Endymion," Scena for Tenor.
Félix Draesecke: Jubel-Ouvertüre.
Dvorak: Symphonic Poem, "Heldenlied," opus 111.
César Franck: Symphonic Poem, "Les Eolides."
Humperdinck: Maurische Rhapsodie.
Glazounoff: Symphony No. 6, in C minor, opus 58.
Grieg: Symphonische Tänze, opus 64.
Vincent d'Indy: "Médée," Orchestral Suite after Catulle Mendès's Tragedy, opus 47.
Mozart: Symphony No. 25, in G minor (Koechel, 183).
Rameau: Ballet Suite, arranged by Mottl.
Siegfried Wagner: Overture to "Der Bärenhäuter."

The works given may be thus summarized according to their form:

Symphonies	24
Suites and Serenades	7
Overtures, Preludes and Symphonic Poems	26
Concertos and Instrumental Solos	13
Scenas, Arias, etc., with Orchestra	12
Miscellaneous	12
Total	94

Different nationalities have been represented by composers and their works as follows (counting each selection as a work):

	Composers.	Works.
English and American	7	7
French and Belgian	6	9
German	23	59
Hungarian and Slavic	10	15
Italian	1	1
Scandinavian	1	3
	48	94

The composers most largely represented were: Beethoven (11 works), Richard Wagner (8 works), Brahms (5 works), Mozart and Tchaikovsky (4 works each), Gluck, Grieg, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann and Richard Strauss (3 works each).

Twenty-two solo performers have taken part in the concerts; 7 pianists, 4 violinists, 2 'cellists and 9 singers. Of these 5 were local artists and 17 visiting strangers. Mr. Ben Davies, the tenor, sang at two concerts.

THE MUSIC HALL

To the Editor of the Transcript:

It may interest some of your older readers as we are saying good-by to our dear old friend, the Music Hall, to be reminded of the feeling which it excited among us when it was opened. In the number of Charles Hale's little paper called Today, for Nov. 20, 1852, (vol. 2, p. 329), is a poem entitled, "The New Music Hall," by William Sydney Thayer, ten years later our consul at Alexandria, which runs as follows:

O fair retreat, where even now
Art's consecrating footprints shine;
Where Song, with her imperial brow,
Shall hold her sway by right divine!
How fast, with beauty girt around,
Arose that miracle of halls,
As if, at music's loving sound
Some weird Amphion built her walls.

Within her gates shall men retire
From care and toil and wasting strife,
And the worn spirit's pure desire
Shall thrill with its immortal life;
From lands remote in future times
Art's eager votaries shall press,
And here, in tones of other climes,
The listening multitude shall bless.

And though beyond old ocean's flood
The homes where their affections dwell,
Stronger than ties of brotherhood,
The power that binds us by its spell;
Oh, not as strangers they unbar
The gates of music to our throng,
For all earth's people kindred are
When kneeling near the shrine of song.

Less than half a century is too short a life for this beautiful building. X.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 29, 1900.

LAST SYMPHONY

Of Beethoven as Well as of the 19th Season of the Symphony Concerts—A Very Large Audience Hears the Stupendous Ninth.

The program of the 24th and last concert of the 19th season of the Symphony concerts was given in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke, conductor. It was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore" No. 2	Beethoven
Quintet from "Cosi fan Tutte"	Mozart
Symphony No. 9	Beethoven

Music Hall was crowded with an audience drawn partly from desire to hear the Choral symphony and partly, perhaps, from the wish to say in after years, "I heard the last Symphony concert in the old Music Hall"; for there are many who are always ready to pay for the privilege of assisting at the first or the last of anything whether it be a ride through the Subway, a trip on a steamer, or an entertainment that may in after years be used as a date to excite the envy of the young and enlarge self-importance.

There was really no need of including the quintet of Mozart in the program. It is delightful music in its proper place, the opera, when it is followed immediately by the chorus that procedes it. The opera itself, also, is never performed here; but given in the little theatre at Munich it is a thing of exquisite beauty according to the testimony of all who have heard it there, and even in an opera house of the size of the Dresden theatre it is a delight.) But in concert and without the archness and the irony of the dramatic situation, and with the extension, by absurd repetition, of the 27 measures to twice that number, the music is without significance. The overture with the symphony would have been enough. Yes, the symphony alone would have been enough, for it is a work that should not be often performed; it should be reserved for a great or a solemn occasion; and there should be long waits for contemplation between the movements.

As for the symphony—what is there to be said about it at this late day? The first three movements are the supreme glory of absolute music. Perhaps the scherzo would gain if it were a little shorter, but the first movement is of unparalleled emotion. I know of nothing in symphonic music equal to the opening measures in which Beethoven broods over the precise tonality that is best suited to the expression of his tumultuous thoughts. And what is there to be compared with the heavenly beauty of the slow movement? The finale is the weakest movement of the four, for if there are a few pages of stupendous grandeur, if the music is once, as Mr. Runciman finely said, lost somewhere among the stars, there are also pages of useless labor and shrieking brutality.

The performance of this work was, on the whole, inferior to certain performances that have been given here. Especially is this true of the first movement, which was read in stiff and academic fashion. The reading of the scherzo was an improvement, but again in the adagio there was an absence of poetic feeling and high imagination. Seldom, if ever, have I heard the theme in D major, that loveliest of all themes, sung with less tenderness. On the other hand, the finale was given for the most part with breadth and spirit. The chorus, which was made up of members of the Cecilia, attacked valiantly the difficulties thrown at it recklessly by the composer, and its performance was one of the most brilliant features of the concert. The solo singers, Mrs. de Vere-Sapio, Miss Stein, Messrs. Ben Davies and Herbert Witherspoon, were equally courageous and made much of the ungrateful, repulsive music allotted to them. Mrs. de Vere-Sapio is especially to be congratulated on her artistry. These same singers, with Mr. W. W. Walker, sang the quintet by Mozart with such effect that after two or three recalls they were obliged to sing it again.

Mr. Gericke was welcomed heartily when he came upon the stage, and after the concert he was applauded so enthusiastically that he made a short speech of thanks to orchestra and audience. Major Higginson was then called for, and he spoke at considerable length. He gave a history of the orchestra; he congratulated the players; he thanked the audience for its generous interest, and he expressed the wish that Mr. Gericke might be the conductor as long as he himself was connected with the orchestra.

The first concert of the 20th season will be Oct. 20 in New Music Hall. I understand that Beethoven's Missa Solemnis will then be performed.

Philip Hale.

The last concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held last evening, and it was also the last Symphony concert which will be given in the old Music Hall. The first concert of the 20th season will be held in the New Music Hall on Oct. 20.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII., NO. 122.
WEDNESDAY, MAY 2, 1900.

Several sentimental Bostonians who have sat in the same seats during many seasons of concerts in Music Hall went yesterday and asked Mr. Comee to save for them the numbers and letter of the bench as mementoes of a time that has vanished!

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, MAY 3, 1900

SOUVENIRS OF MUSIC HALL

Music Lovers Who Have Been to Music Hall All Their Lives Crave Even a Piece of Plaster as a Relic

At noon today in Music Hall the strangest audience yet sat down. It was composed of the workmen who are engaged in tearing down the old place, and as they gathered around the dinner pails and smoked, the pops in all their glory never looked jollier. Since the work of tearing down began on Monday, there has been more or less excitement among the workmen, for somebody was injudicious enough to make the remark that this was one of the last buildings put up when the old custom of serving rum prevailed, and it is rumored that somewhere in one of the pillars is buried a jug of this same ancient stuff. Whether the hope of finding the treasure spurs the men or not is the question, but the fact remains that the work is being hastened at a great rate. Practically the inside of the hall has been cleaned out. The sounding-board has been taken down, and all who saw how one end of it was double sheathed are breathing prayers of thankfulness to think that fire never touched the place, for if it had, this hollow screen instantly would have curtained the great stage with flame.

For fear there will be some accident the people are not allowed in the place, but the guard at the door is constantly visited by some good old Bostonian who cannot bear to have the historic old place go without one tangible relic, if it is nothing mare than a bit of plaster. That is just what one woman asked for, "Give me something of the old hall to keep for my very own—I don't care what it is if it is only a splinter of wood or a bit of plaster." Colonel Henry L. Higginson gave orders to have all the statuary and the old clock carefully removed. Frederic R. Comee secured for his souvenir the old bell which has for years tinkled at the Winter-street entrance, and L. H. Mudgett is happy in the possession of one of those little bronze cupids blowing trumpets which surmounted the chandeliers. Those chandeliers were hailed with delight, for upon examination it was found that they were composed of little Roman lamps of a fine old pattern, while above were the cupids. Some of the relic seekers would be content with nothing but the number and letter plate which marked the seat they had sat in for years. At the very first these seats had been removed to the basement, and are there piled up awaiting the time when something can be done with them. One man would not go away content until at least he had tried to get the plates off his seats, and he rumaged around in the dusty débris, until finally he decided that the only way to do was to wait, so he left his name and the numbers, P. 28 and 29, with Superintendent Russell, and secured the promise that he should have them.

Strange to say others have been seized with the same desire, and have left their orders for their seat plates. Still others have wanted even more, and have asked if they might not purchase the entire seats. These old seats are of black walnut, and are not at all bad souvenirs. Then, too, in the green room there were two handsome wall brackets which have been disposed of, and each of the chairs found a covetous owner. Wherever the lights were fastened on to the balcony there were plaster rosettes, and these were spoken for even before they were taken down.

The dedication of the new Music Hall is fully planned. It will occur on Oct. 15, and the great Beethoven Mass in D will be sung. Mr. Gericke's choice of a choral work, to be performed by the Cecilia, together with his orchestra, as the most fitting celebration of the occasion, indeed honors the club, but it is also a fully deserved recognition of the society's rank in the musicianship of Boston. Mr. Lang put it to vote by the club whether they would undertake the great Mass or a less exacting work. The Mass was chosen unanimously. Rehearsals are already in progress at Union Hall, under Mr. Gericke's direction. It is a great undertaking. One hears reminiscences of how Mr. Lang met his singers four and five times a week, when the Mass was sung so successfully several years ago; but all that hard study tells now. Mr. Gericke is much pleased with the work of the club, and in speaking to them of their singing in the Ninth Symphony, said that "nothing had ever given him more pleasure."

The Cecilia has invited guests, all personal friends, to assist in the dedication, and a large representation from the Apollo Club responded to Mr. Lang's invitation. Every singer is pledged to attend all rehearsals, which are arranged for May and late September, and the work is being done with the heartiest interest and enthusiasm. The chorus as it now stands represents the most earnest musical endeavor of Boston, the highest level of musical achievement which our citizens have reached, and is a fitting companion to the orchestra. Mr. Lang is to be congratulated on such a consummation of the work to which he has given himself so steadfastly, so generously, for so many years.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, MAY 6, 1900.

The new Music hall will be dedicated Oct 15 with the Beethoven mass in D, performed by the Cecilia club and the Boston symphony orchestra. Rehearsals have already begun under Mr Gericke's direction. The Cecilia has invited guests, all personal frineds, to assist in the dedicaton, and a large representation from the Apollo club responded to Mr Lang's invitation. Every singer is pledged to attend all rehearsals, which are arranged for May and late September, and the work is being done with the heartiest interest and enthusiasm.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, MAY 4, 1900.

RAZING MUSIC HALL.

Music Lovers Who Have Been to Music Hall All Their Lives Crave Even a Piece of Plaster as a Relic.

At noon yesterday, in Music Hall the strangest audience yet sat down. It was composed of the workmen who are engaged in tearing down the old place, and as they gathered around the dinner pails and smoked, the pops in all their glory never looked jollier.

Since the work of tearing down began on Monday, there has been more or less excitement among the workmen, for somebody was injudicious enough to make the remark that this was one of the last buildings put up when the old custom of serving rum prevailed, and it is rumored that somewhere in one of the pillars is buried a jug of this same ancient stuff.

For fear there will be some accident the people are not allowed in the place, but the guard at the door is constantly visited by some good old Bostonian who cannot bear to have the historic old place go without one tangible relic, if it is nothing more than a bit of plaster.

That is just what one woman asked for: "Give me something of the old hall to keep for my very own—I don't care what it is if it is only a splinter of wood or a bit of plaster."

Col. Henry L. Higginson gave orders to have all the statuary and the old clock carefully removed. Frederick R. Comee secured for his souvenir the old bell which has for years tinkled at the Winter Street entrance, and L. H. Mudgett is happy in the possession of one of those little bronze cupids blowing trumpets which surmounted the chandeliers. Those chandeliers were hailed with delight, for upon examination it was found that they were composed of little Roman lamps of a fine old pattern, while above were the cupids.

One man would not go away content until at least he had tried to get the plates off his seats, and he rummaged around in the dusty debris until finally he decided that the only way to do was to wait, so he left his name and the numbers, P 28 and 29, with Supt. Russell, and secured the promise that he should have them.

Strange to say, others have been seized with the same desire, and have left their orders for their seat plates.

Music and Musicians
By
Philip Hale

A Few Words About the Late Musical Season—Mr. Gericke—Foreign and Domestic Notes.

MR. GERICKE was commendably catholic in his choice of compositions last season. Beethoven led with 11 performances, Wagner followed with 8, Brahms with 5, Tschaikowsky and Mozart with 4, and Gluck, Richard Strauss, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Grieg with 3. The new symphonies were by Berger, Glazounoff, Mozart. France was represented by Berlioz, Franck, d'Indy, Lalo, Rameau, Saint-Saëns; Russia by Arenski, Borodin, Glazounoff, Rimski-Korsakoff, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky. The sensitive American composer was not slighted, and it was reserved for Mr. Ben Davies by singing Cowen's "Dream of Endymion" to show us to what a depth of stupidity an English composer can plunge himself when he thinks he is winging his flight toward the azure.

Let us hope that Mr. Gericke will continue to be liberal in his views. There are names that should be more familiar to the Symphony audience: Among the French and Belgians, Charpentier, Debussy, d'Indy, Dukas, Block, Benoit, Rébaud, Pierné, de Bréville, Chausson (I name at random). Glazounoff, Balakireff and Rimsky-Korsakoff would give many pleasure. And I confess that I should like to hear Edgar Stillman Kelley's "Aladdin Suite"; but Mr. Kelley is an American who has the misfortune not to live in Boston.

Whether French and Russian works are performed here under Mr. Gericke in the spirit in which they are written and felt by the composers is another question. It is undoubtedly hard for a man of Mr. Gericke's artistic education and career in Vienna to sympathize fully with the ultra modern music of France and Russia, to appreciate the peculiar effects of rhythm and color, to divine the intention. No one can be more faithful in rehearsal, more scrupulous in desire for a perfect performance than is Mr. Gericke when he has determined to lead one of these works; but he has not a flaming temperament, nor is his personal enthusiasm, however great or small it may be, contagious. There is much music that reveals his admirable qualities as in full day. On the other hand I fear that he is constitutionally incapable of giving passionate performances of works that do not really appeal to him, works that he regards as bizarre or a little sensational. He glows when he leads the austere music of Brahms; he is chilly when he leads a work like the Pathetic Symphony of Tschaikowsky. I am aware that many in Boston still prefer Haydn and Spohr to Tschaikowsky, Franck, Lalo, d'Indy, Richard Strauss and others; and to them it is perhaps a joy when an ultra modern work does not make an immediate effect; nor do they stop to ask whether this be the fault of the music or the conductor or their own lack of imagination. Hugues Imbert once wrote of Lamoureux: "He has his orchestra in a state of military discipline. * * * The strings, playing as one man, produce surprising effects of homogeneousness, sonority, nuance; the wind is perhaps the best we know; the wood-wind has an astonishing finesse and the brass a superb brilliance. And thus he obtains in works wherein lyricism is not the distinguishing note, absolutely perfect performances. But in music of great dramatic power, of broad sweep, where it is necessary to lift the orchestra and to communicate to it passion that bursts forth, there is hardness, there is dryness. Punctuation is too faithfully observed, and, to use a popular expression, the whole is too sandpapered."

⁂

Under the skillful and intelligent direction of Mr. Emil Mollenhauer the Handel and Haydn has taken a new lease of life. Let us hope that next season it will break away from its narrow repertory and perform some work that is at least comparatively unfamiliar. And why was it necessary to hire Gadski for "Elijah?" Was the difference in the box office receipts really worth the experiment of hiring a foreigner when there are American women who are competent, and a foreigner who did not choose, or was unable to sing in the ensembles?

⁂

The first great pianist of the season was de Pachmann, and throughout the season he gave delight by his unapproachable rhythm, color and sense of proportion. Paderewski pounded the hearts of his admirers; Hambourg gave a fine imitation of speed and steam, and the young Dohnányi played with a calculated repose and aplomb that argue ill for his future. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler gave more than ordinary pleasure, as did Miss Heyman, a pianist who gives promise of a brilliant future. Miss Ruegger, 'cellist, was a welcome visitor; on the other hand, Miss Leonora Jackson and Petschnikoff made us wonder at the foreign and passionate press notices that trumpeted their approach. Miss Clara Butt fascinated by her unusual physical proportions, and made us regret that her beautiful and impressive voice had not been better schooled. Mr. Gebhard showed us that the confidence of his friends was not without foundation. Mr. Arthur Whiting played musically, even when he sacrificed himself on the altar of Brahms in solemn recital. Mr. Ludwig Breitner was hampered by Schütt's miserable concerto and an attack of nerves. Mr. Hugh Codman, violinist, introduced the sonata of Lalo for piano and violin. Miss Frieda Siemens, pianist, was spasmodically brilliant in a manner to awaken hope for her future. Mr. Marteau has made marked progress in breadth and authority. He must now be reckoned with very seriously, although he did not honor a Symphony Concert by his appearance. Sembrich dazzled in song as well as in opera. The Musical Art Society of New York sang well, but the chorus, as a chorus and without any question of conductor, has not the fine body of tone that characterizes the Cecilia. Marie Brema sang physically rather than musically. Then there were concerts in which M. W. Whitney, Jr., Miss Lunde, W. A. Howland, Francis Rogers, Ray Finel, Suzanne Adams, Leo Stern, Miss Durno, Mrs. Rice, L. B. Merrill, Earl Gulick, Miss Corea, Felix Winternitz, F. W. Wodell, Armand Lecomte, the Turpen-Turpin Quartet, Ernest Sharpe, Mme. Clarke, Mr. Rotoli (with his Roman Mass), Julia and Max Heinrich, Miss Rennyson, Philip Dalmas, Victor da Prato, Mrs. Schiller, Miss Fogg, Wilhelm Heinrich, J. M. Horner, the People's Choral Union, Weldon Hunt, Miss Cole, Miss Thompson, Miss Tucker, Mrs. Hemenway, Stephen Townsend, Mr. Van Vliet took part. And no doubt there were other concerts which I have overlooked.

The Kneisel Quartet produced as novelties Borodin's quartet No. 1, Tschaikowsky's sextet, Dvorák's terzetto, R. Strauss's piano quartet, and Dohnányi's piano quintet. These concerts were for the most part of the high excellence that has given the club an enviable reputation from California to this Commonwealth.

Two of the pleasantest features of the season were the fine performance by Mr. Kneisel of Mr. Loeffler's revised edition of his characteristic and beautifully orchestrated "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," and the performance by Mr. Timothée Adamowski of Lalo's Symphonie Espagnole.

The Cecilia performed for the first time in Boston, H. W. Parker's "St. Christopher," Coleridge Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast" and Stanford's "Phaudrig Crohoore."

No new opera was performed here by the Grau company. The new singers were Bertram, Pini-Corsi, Scotti, Illy. Of these Scotti easily bore away the honors, although Bertram was far less objectionable than the German Wagnerian declaimer, male or female, to whom we are, unfortunately, accustomed.

⁂

Boston Herald
June 10 - 1900

PADEREWSKI ON ORCHESTRAS.

[From the Chicago Chronicle.]

The reigning pianist, who has played with every orchestra of note on both continents, and who has no reason to be partisan among them, will astound the old world by his assertion that the Boston Symphony orchestra is the finest inthe world.

This has long been the opinion of travelled Americans, whose belief was necessarily open to doubt as biased.

It is to be observed that neither Paderewski nor any other virtuoso has been inclined to speak in such terms of the Chicago orchestra, conducted by Theodore Thomas.

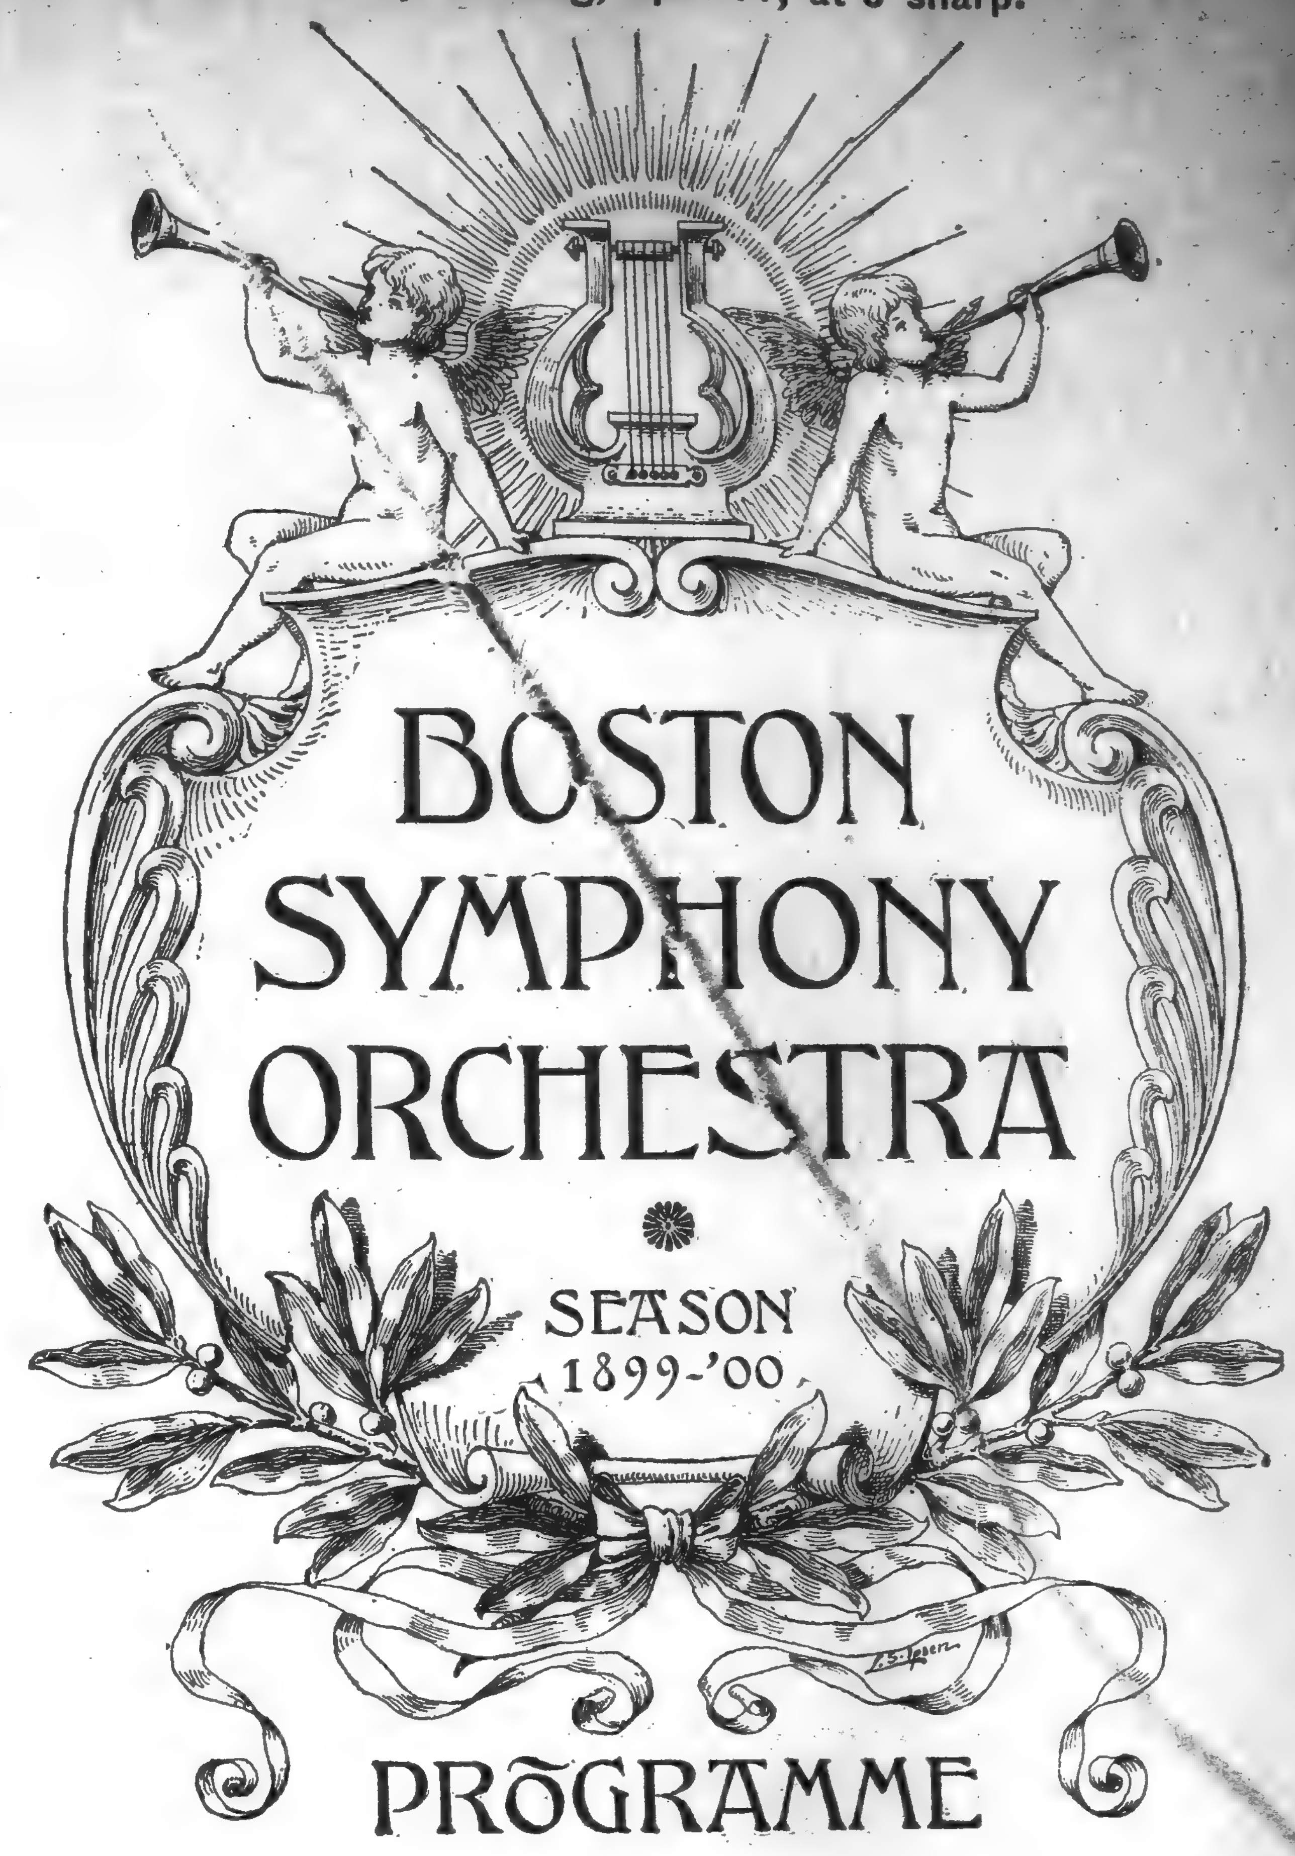
Time was when Mr. Thomas rendered substantial service to music in the United States. But since he was made independent of public criticism by a private guarantee his mastery of his players has been uncertain.

The unity, cohesion, balance, purity and precision that have made the Boston orchestra celebrated it has been impossible of late years to find in the effects produced by the instrumentalists directed by Mr. Thomas.

BLANK PAGE

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, April 11, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

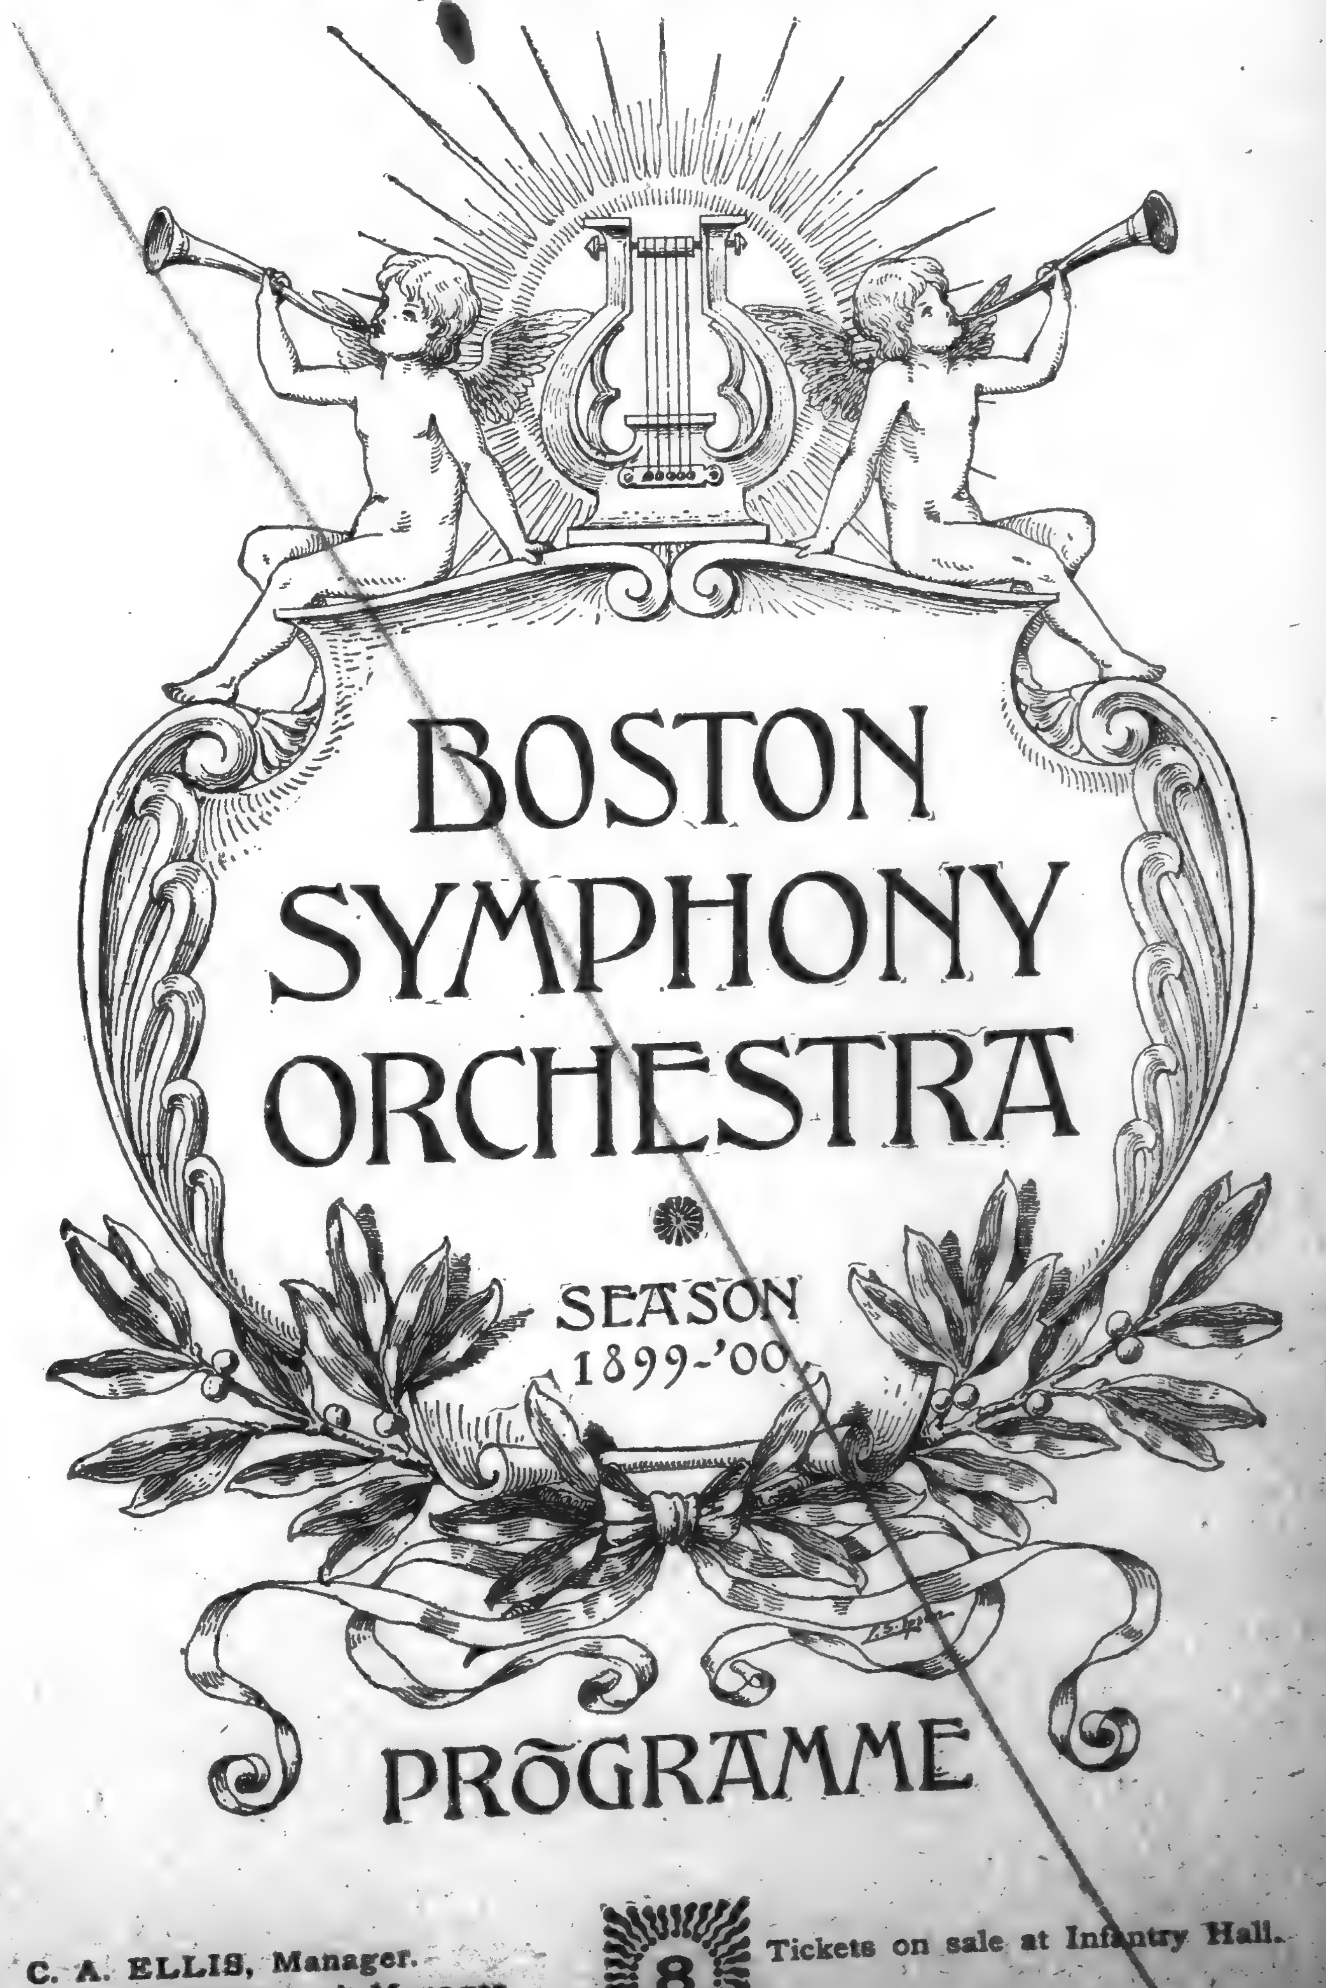
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

7

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, April 25, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

8

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

[108]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - - BROOKLYN.
Saturday Evening, March 24, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

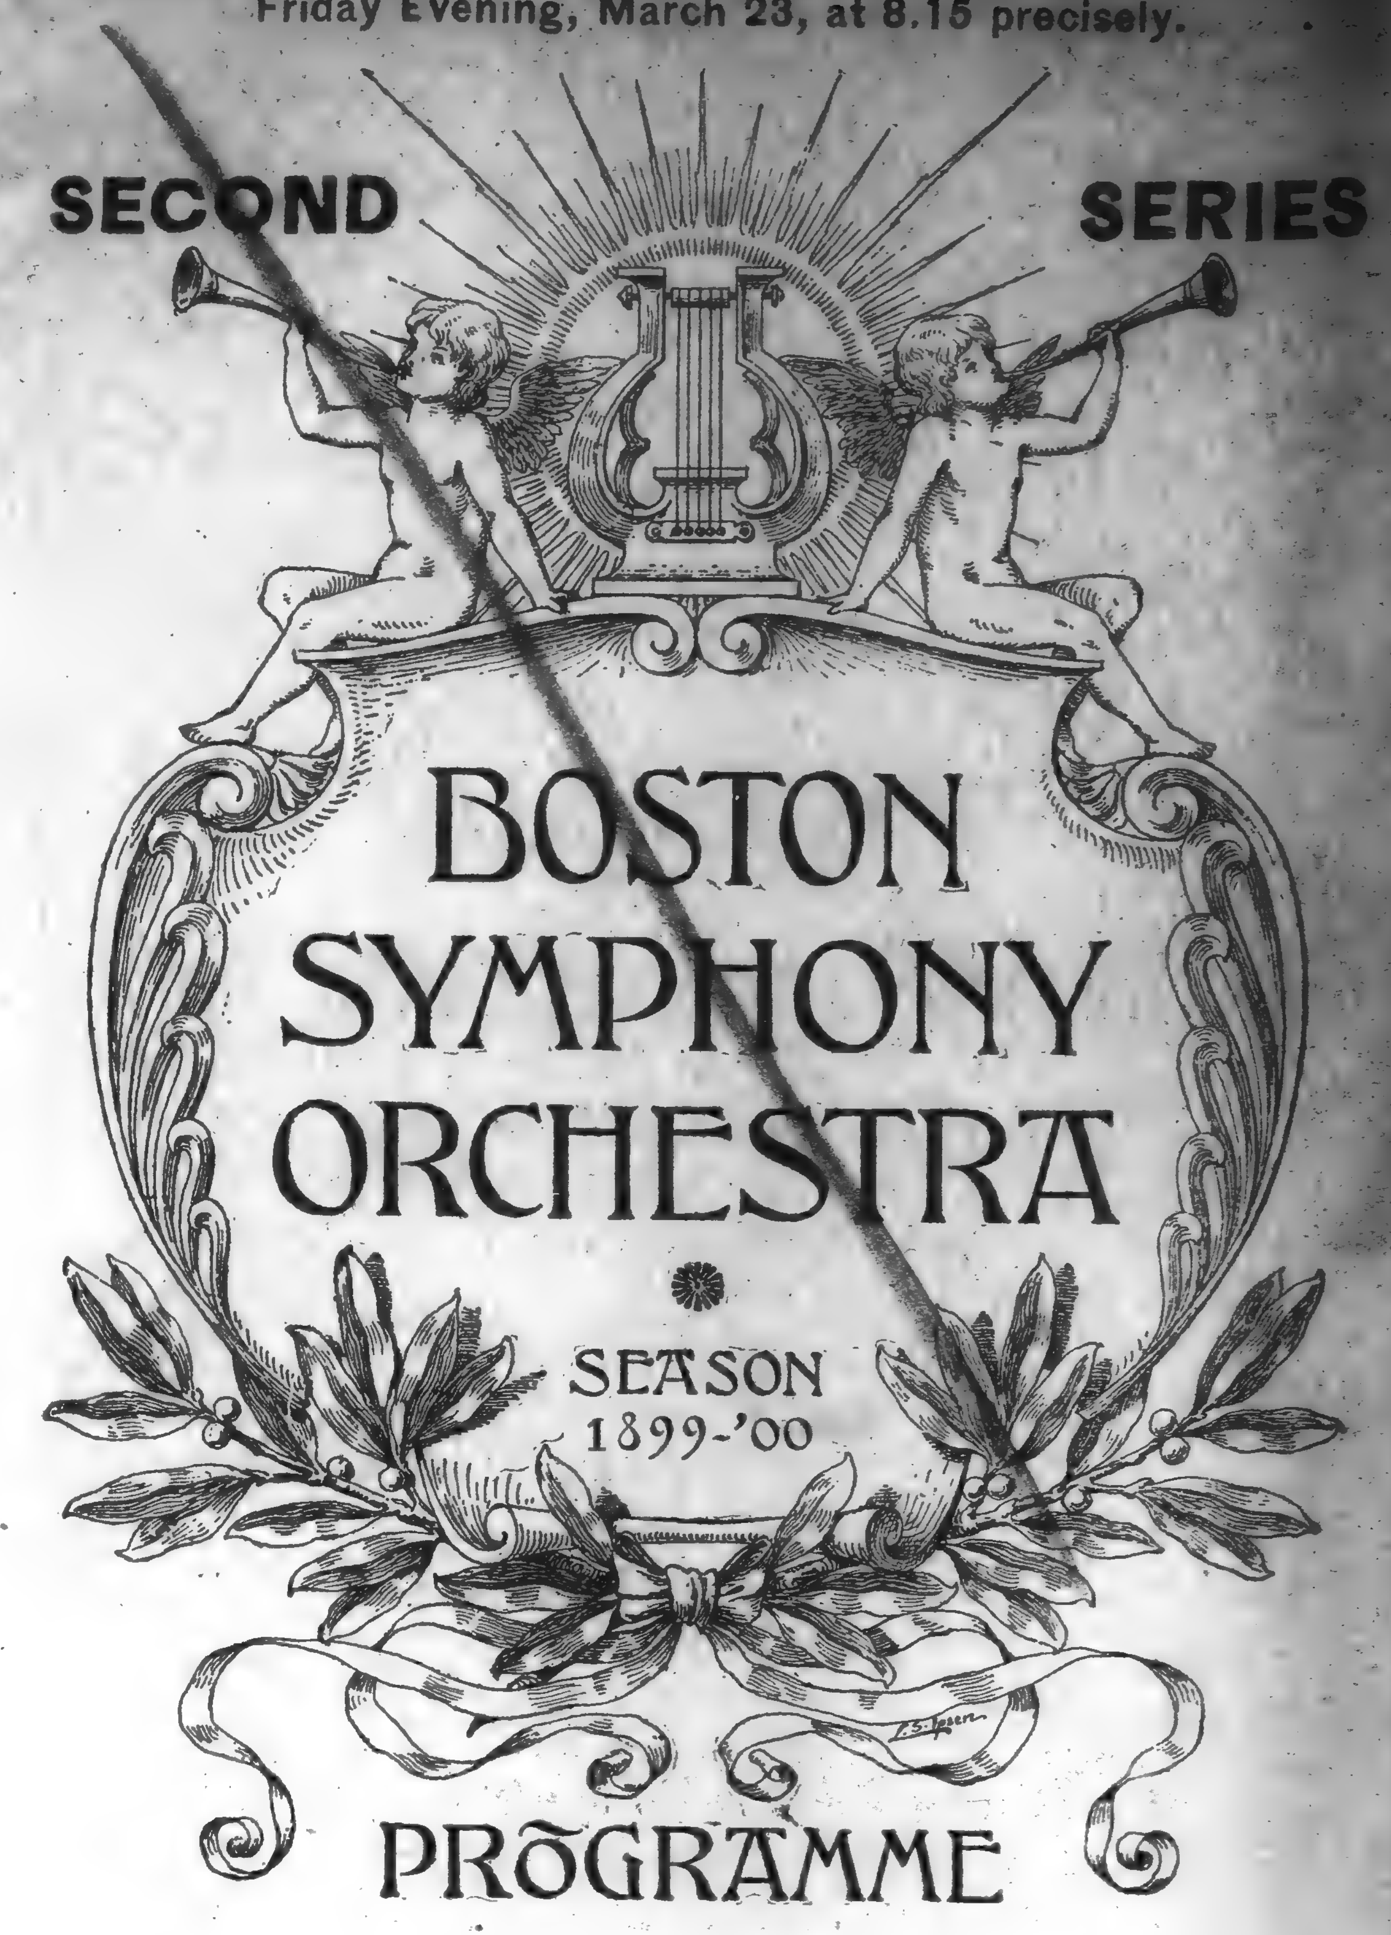
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - - PHILADELPHIA.
Friday Evening, March 23, at 8.15 precisely.

SECOND SERIES



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

THE COLISEUM, - - - - - HARTFORD.
Wednesday Evening, April 4, at 8.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

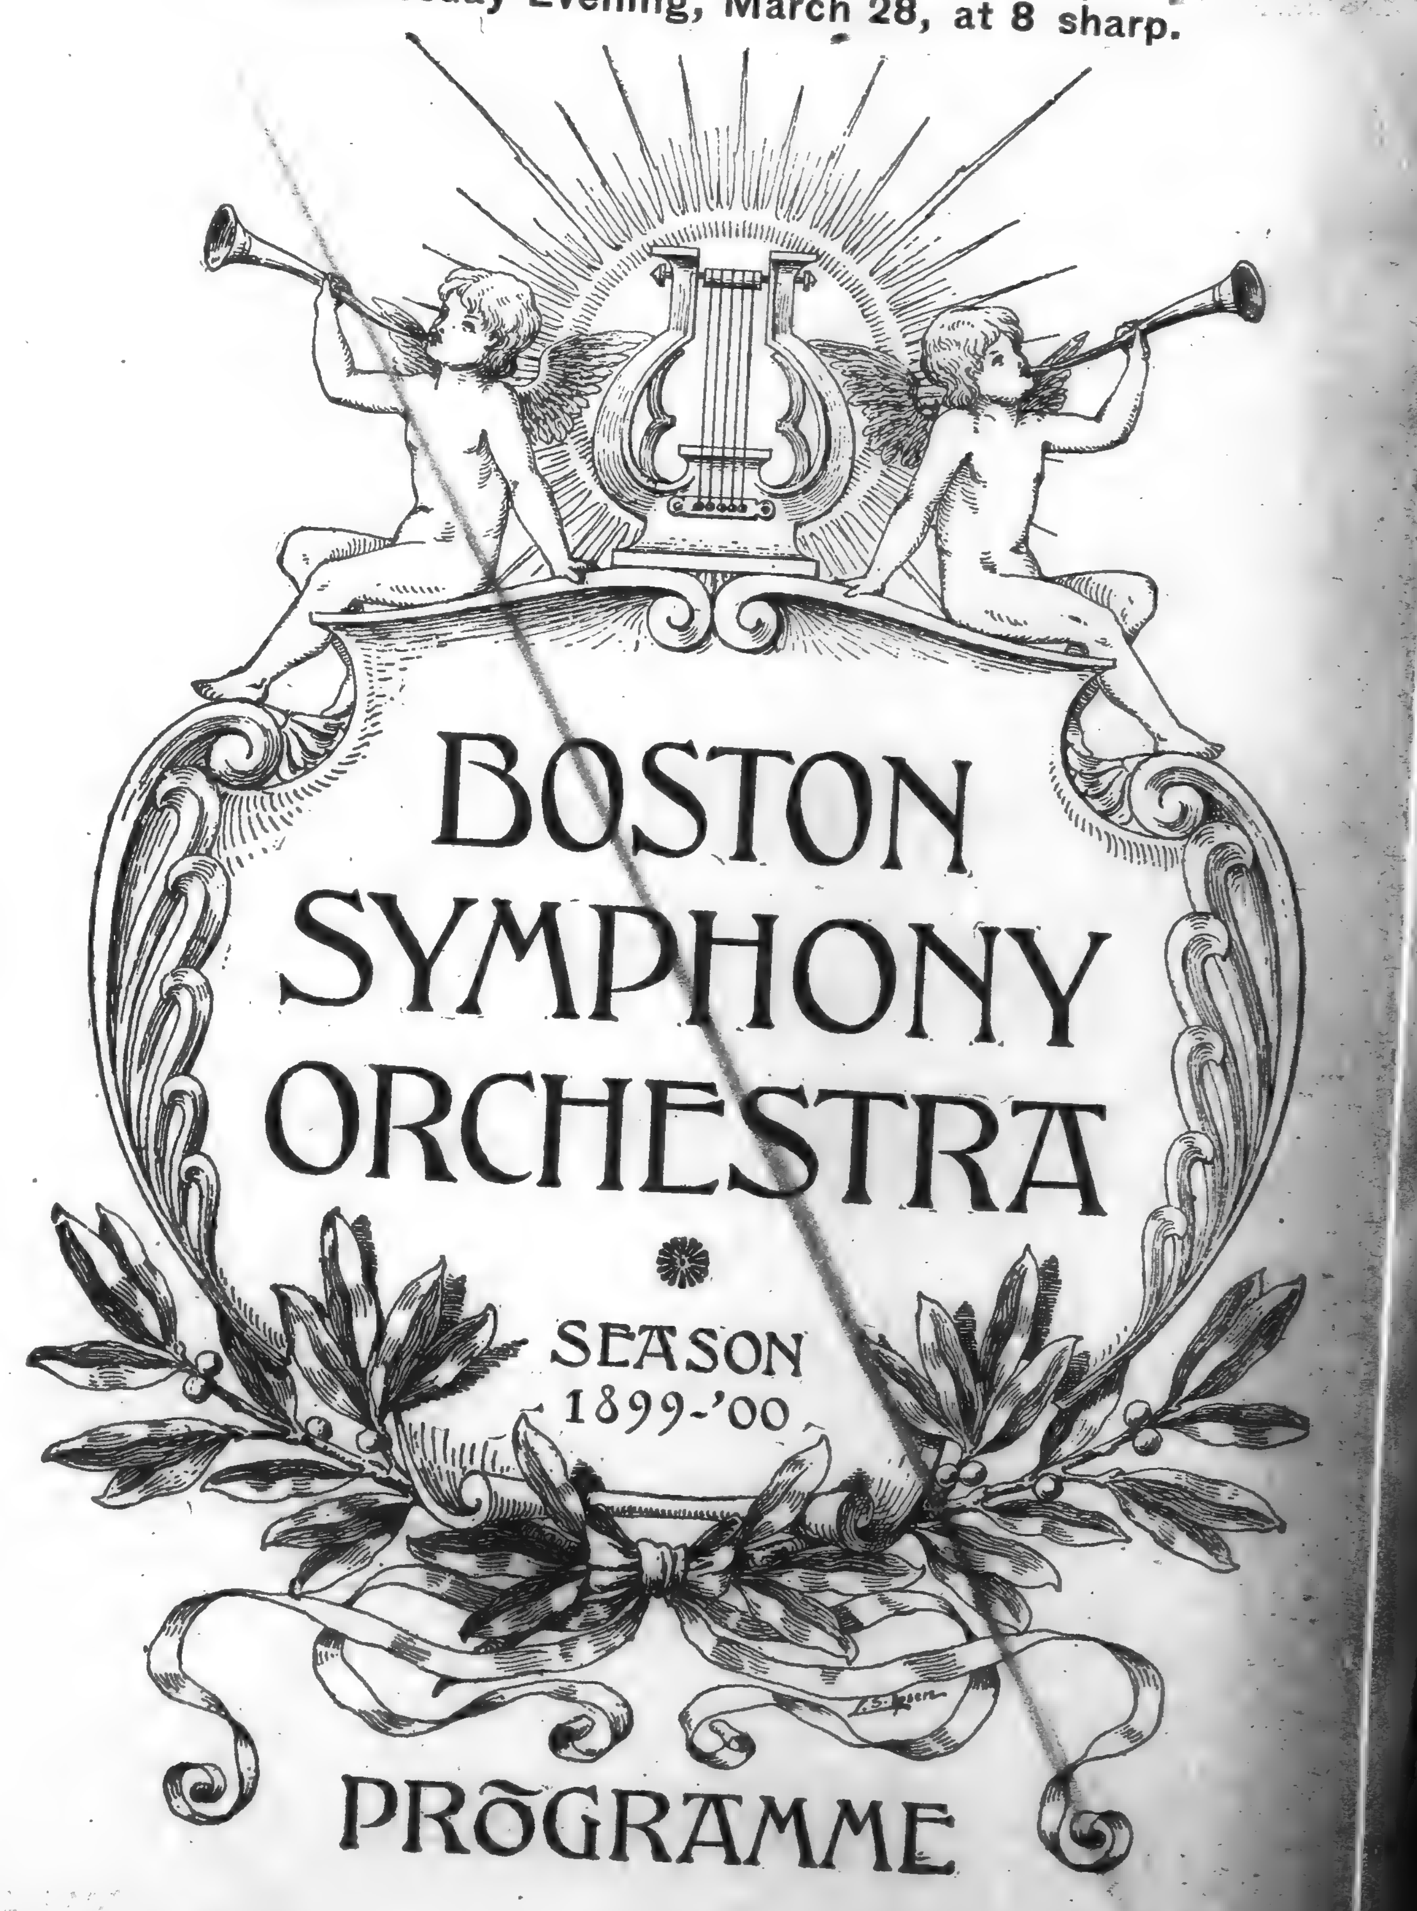
SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 28, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

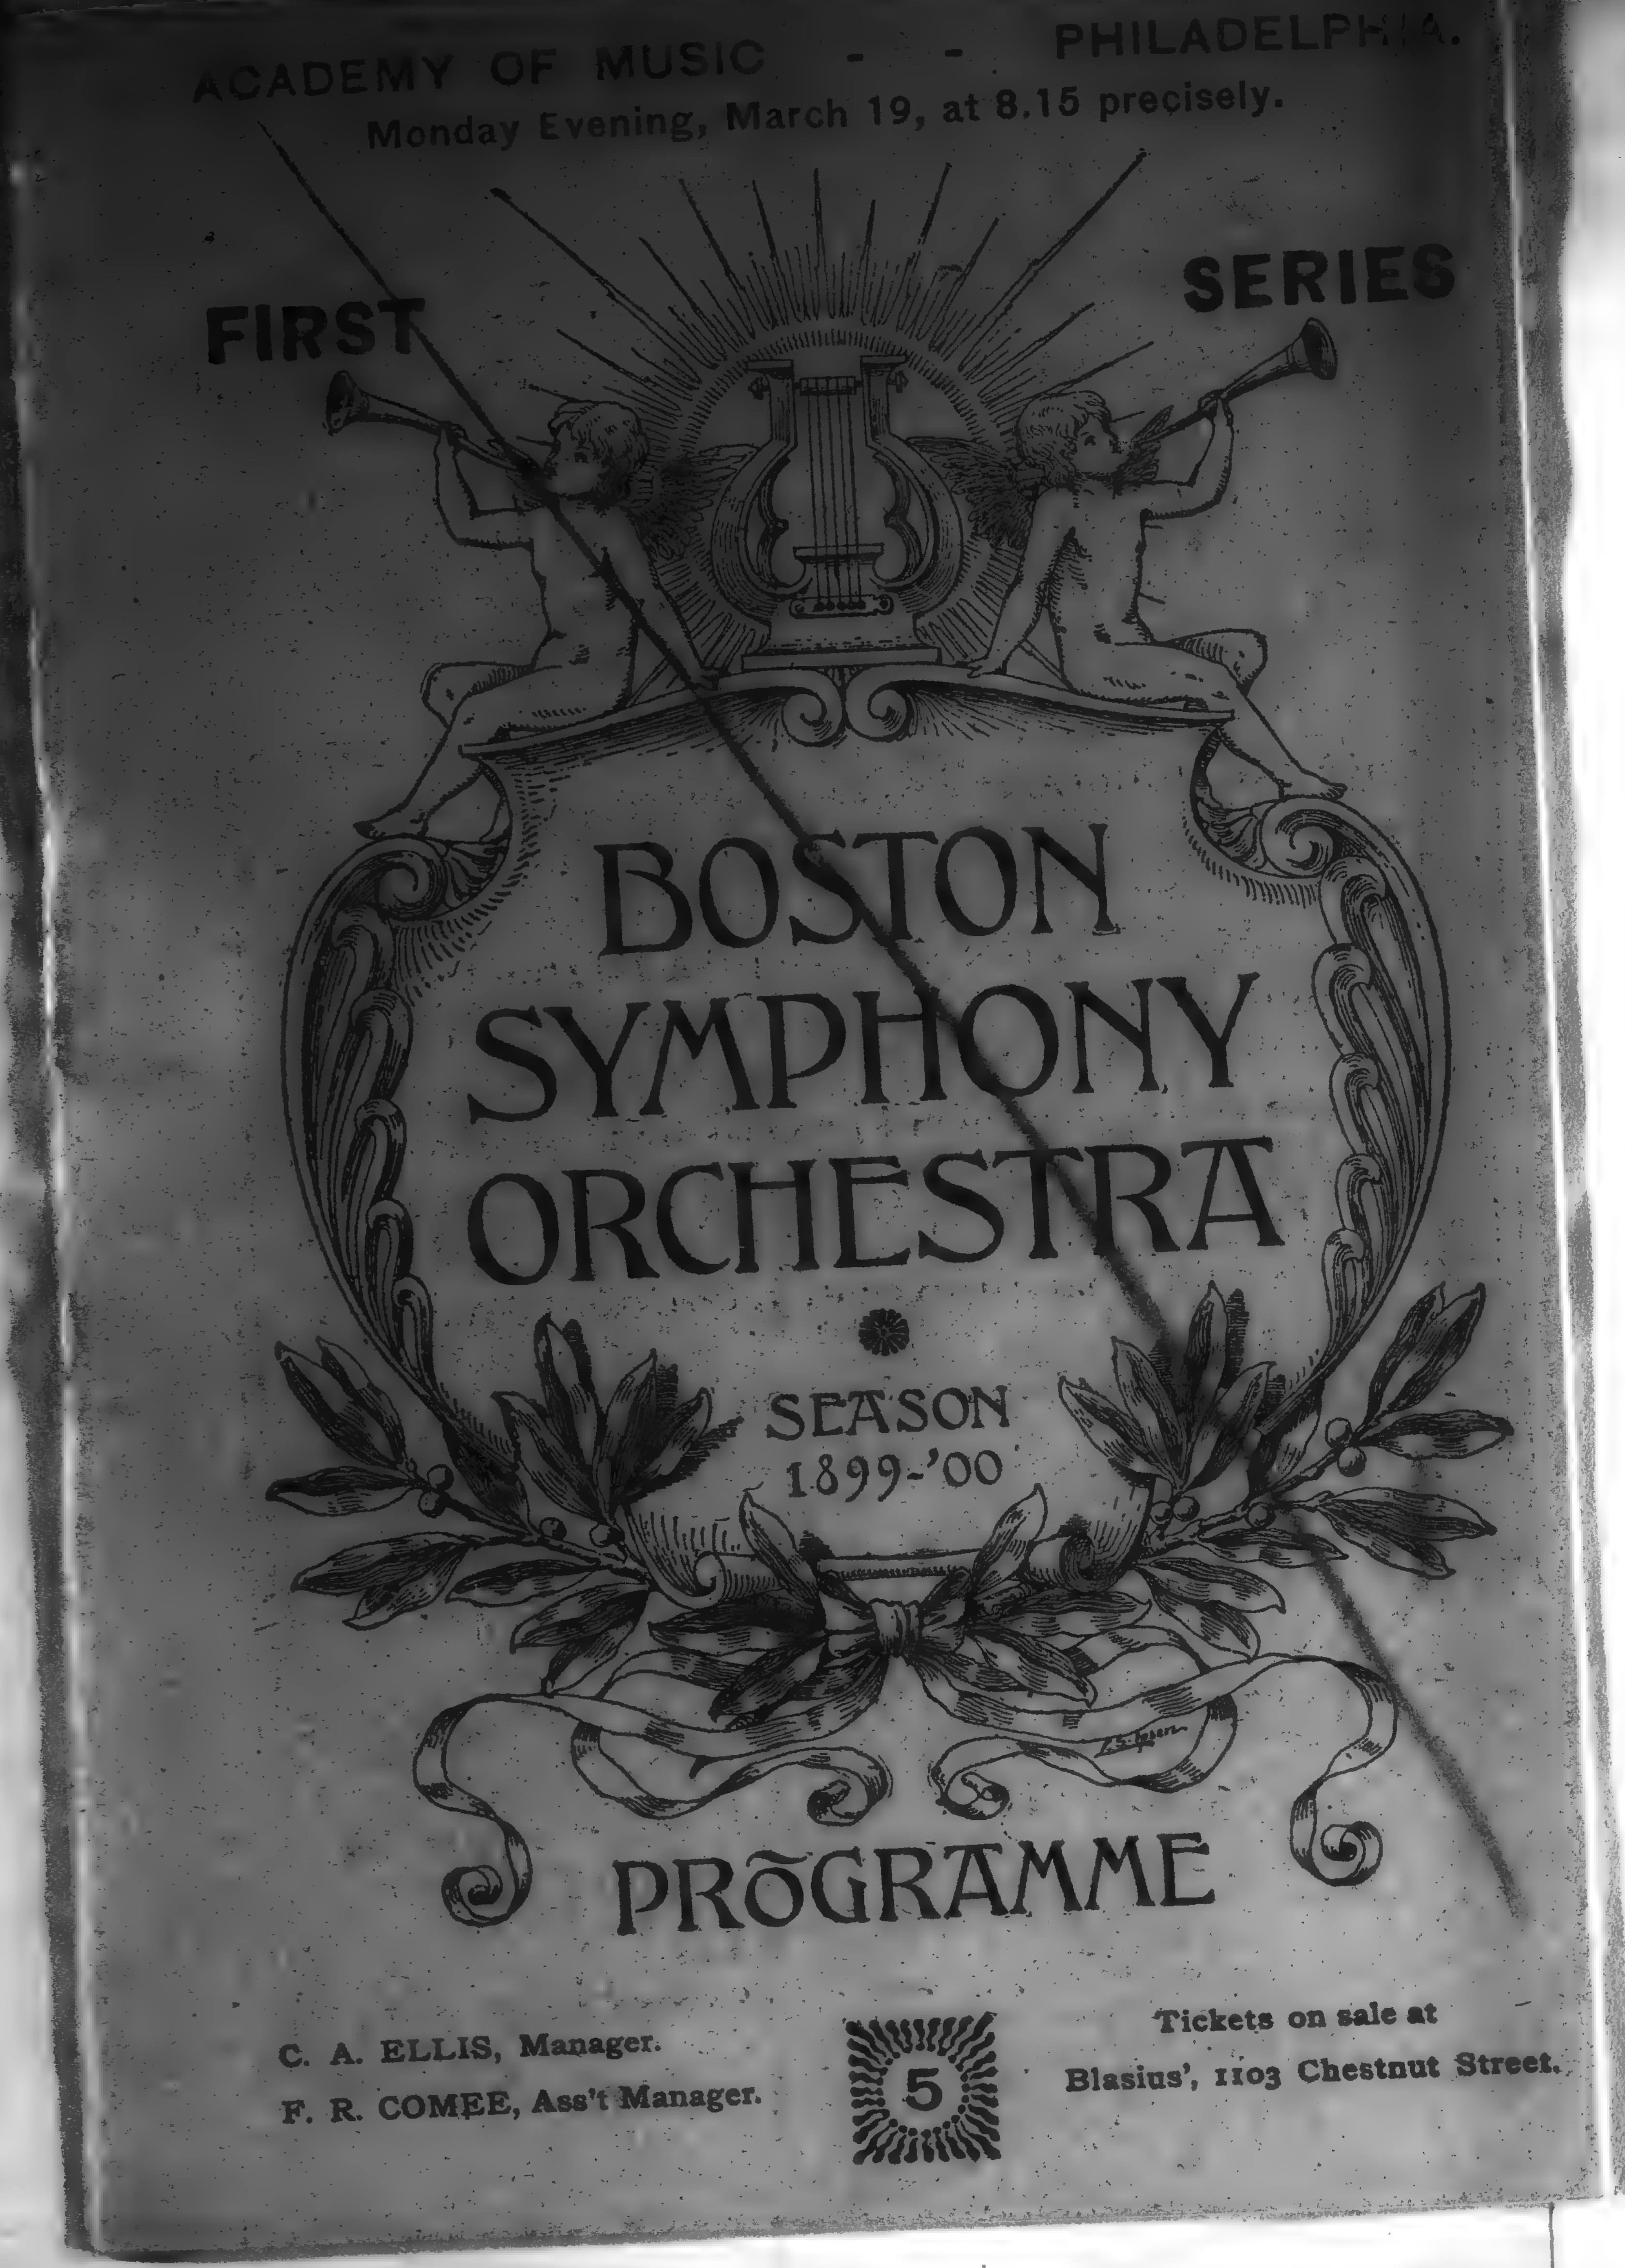
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES



ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, March 19, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

SMETANA. OVERTURE to "The Bartered Bride."

BEETHOVEN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 58.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.
IV. Rondo: Vivace.

PAINE. BALLET-MUSIC from the Opera "Azara;" Three Moorish Dances.
I. Allegretto animato.
II. Poco meno mosso.
III. Introduction: Allegretto quasi Andante.
Allegretto con moto e grazioso.

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.
I. Ziemlich langsam.—Lebhaft.
II. Romanze; Ziemlich langsam.
III. Scherzo Lebhaft.—Trio.
IV. Langsam.—Lebhaft.

Soloist:

Mr. ERNST VON DOHNANYI.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, March 21, at 2.30 precisely.
Thursday Evening, March 22, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

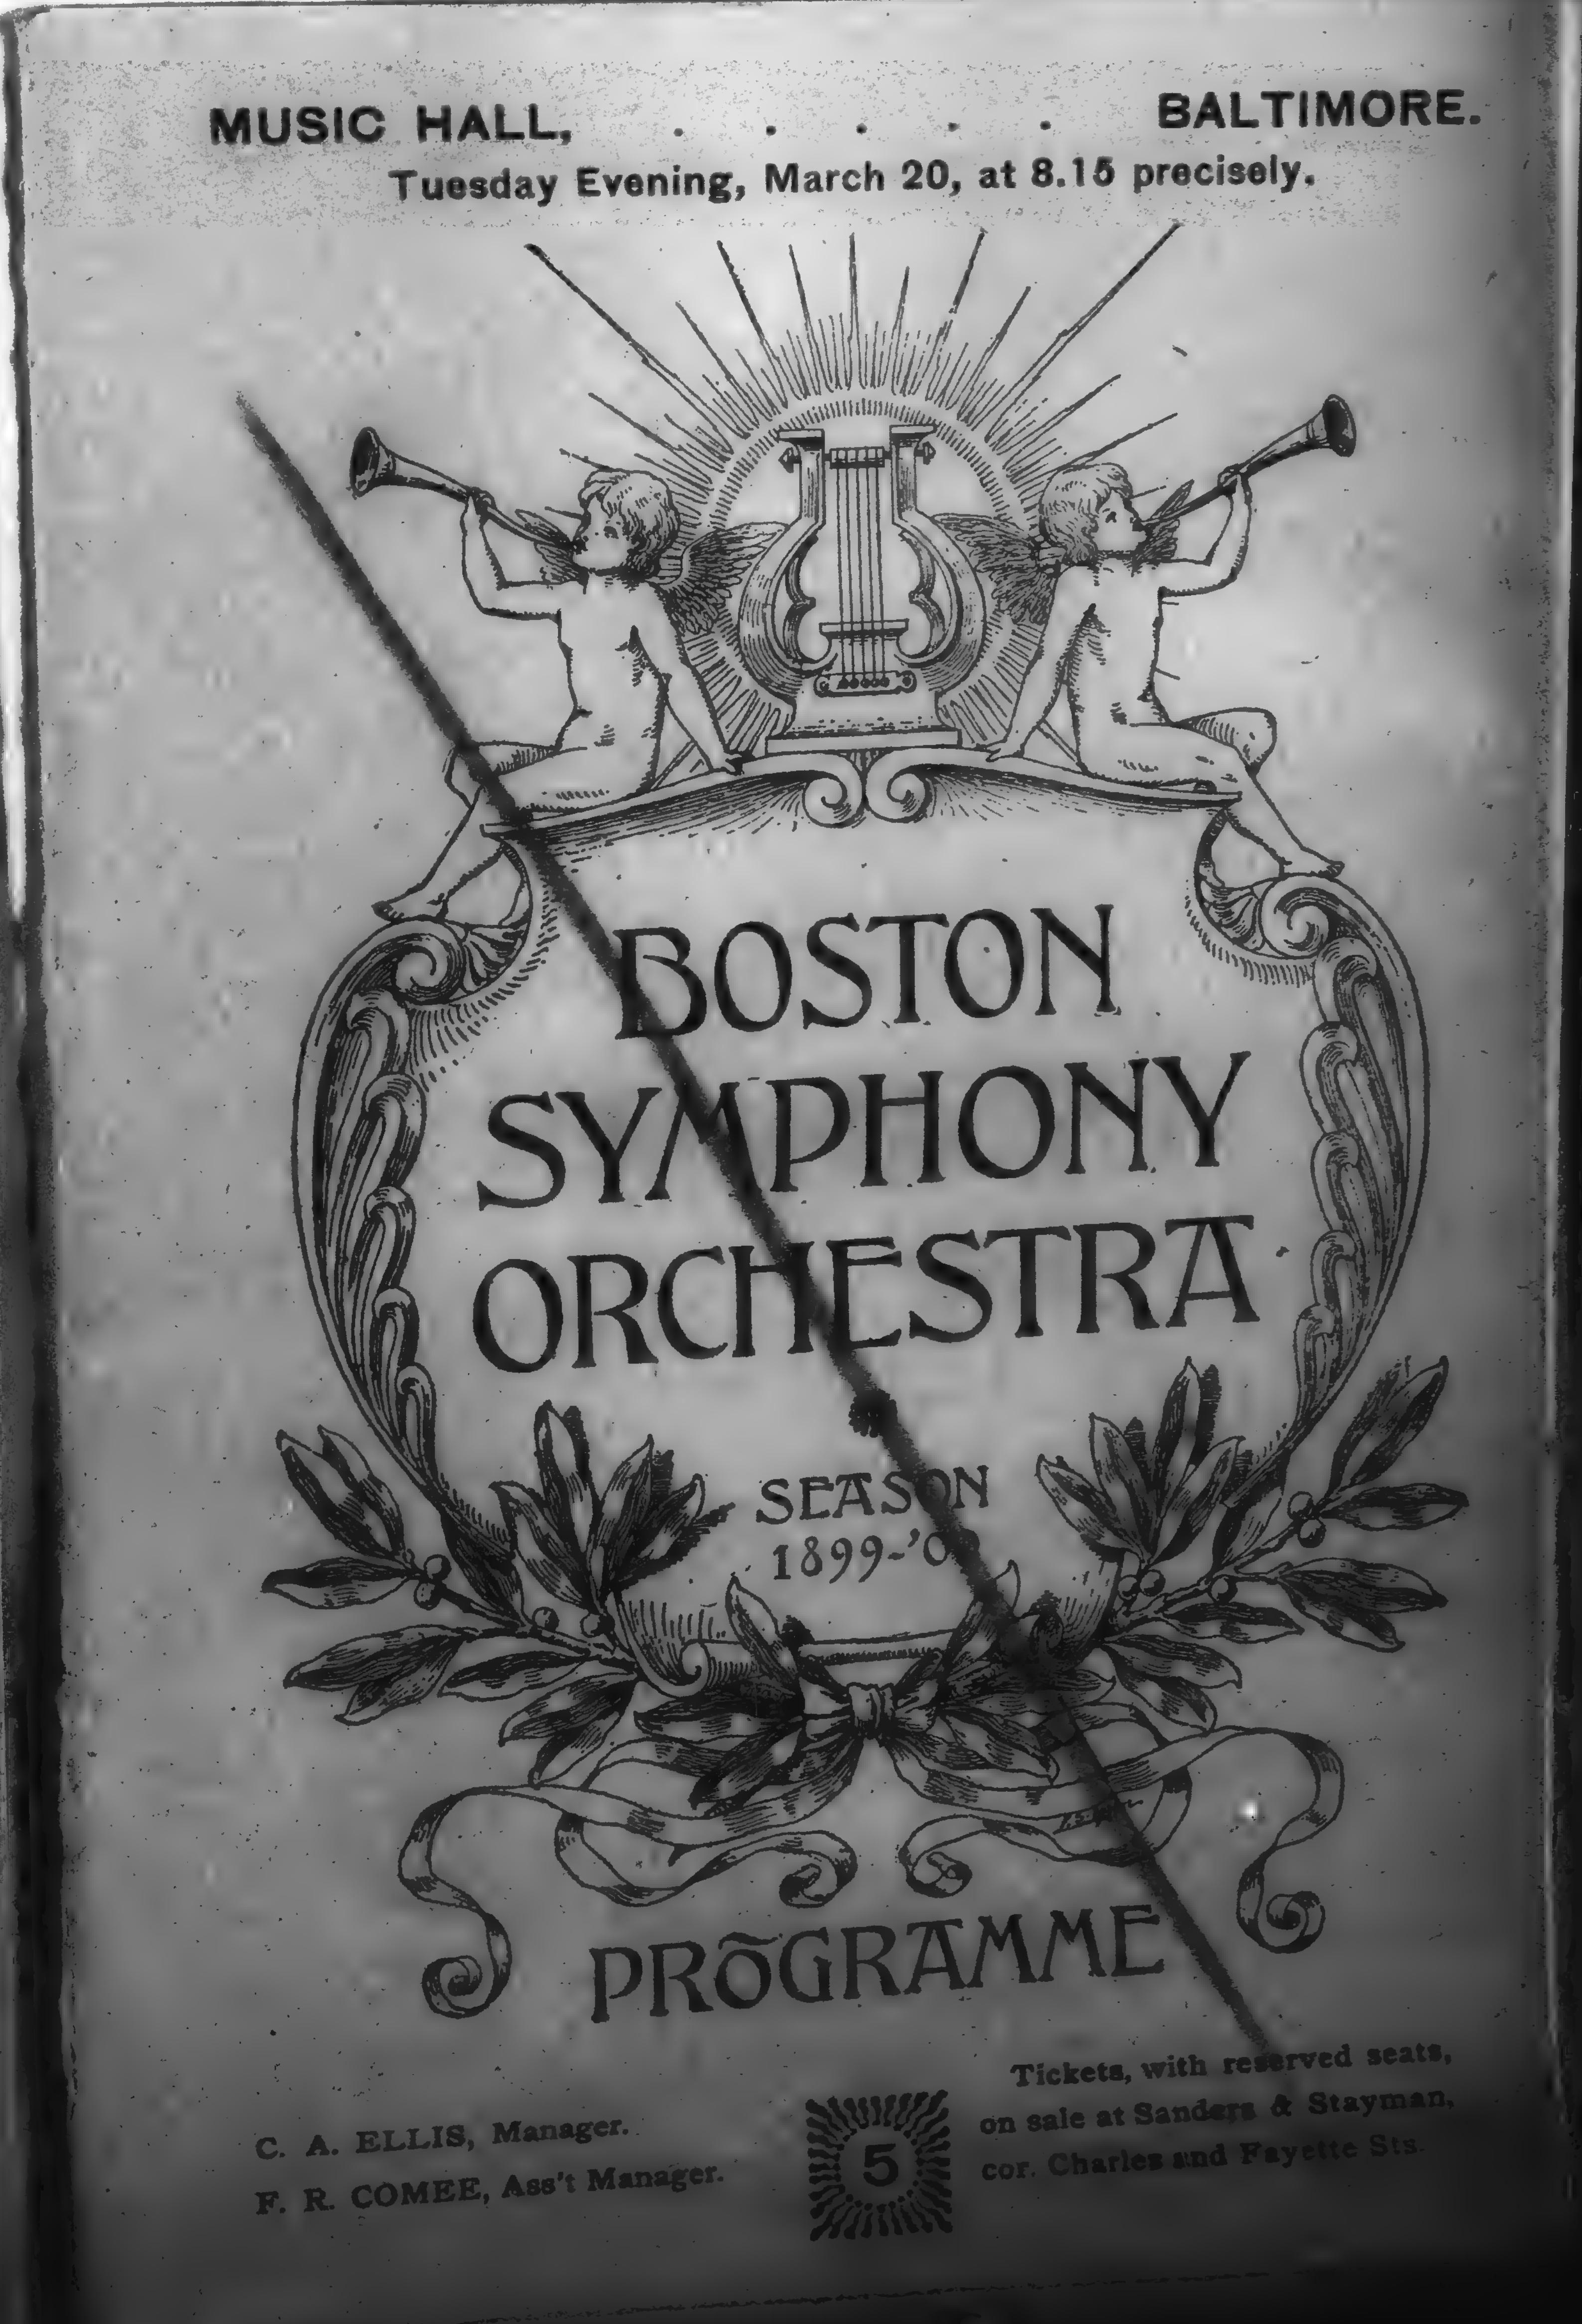
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

110



MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, March 20, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats,
on sale at Sanders & Stayman,
cor. Charles and Fayette Sts.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, March 19, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, MARCH 15, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

SMETANA.	OVERTURE to "The Bartered Bride."
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 58. I. Allegro moderato. II. Andante con moto. IV. Rondo: Vivace.
PAINE.	BALLET-MUSIC from the Opera "Azara;" Three Moorish Dances. I. Allegretto animato. II. Poco meno mosso. III. Introduction: Allegretto quasi Andante. Allegretto con moto e grazioso.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120. I. Ziemlich langsam.—Lebhaft. II. Romanze; Ziemlich langsam. III. Scherzo Lebhaft.—Trio. IV. Langsam.—Lebhaft.

Soloist:

Mr. ERNST VON DOHNANYI.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, March 21, at 2.30 precisely.
Thursday Evening, March 22, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

[110]

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, March 20, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

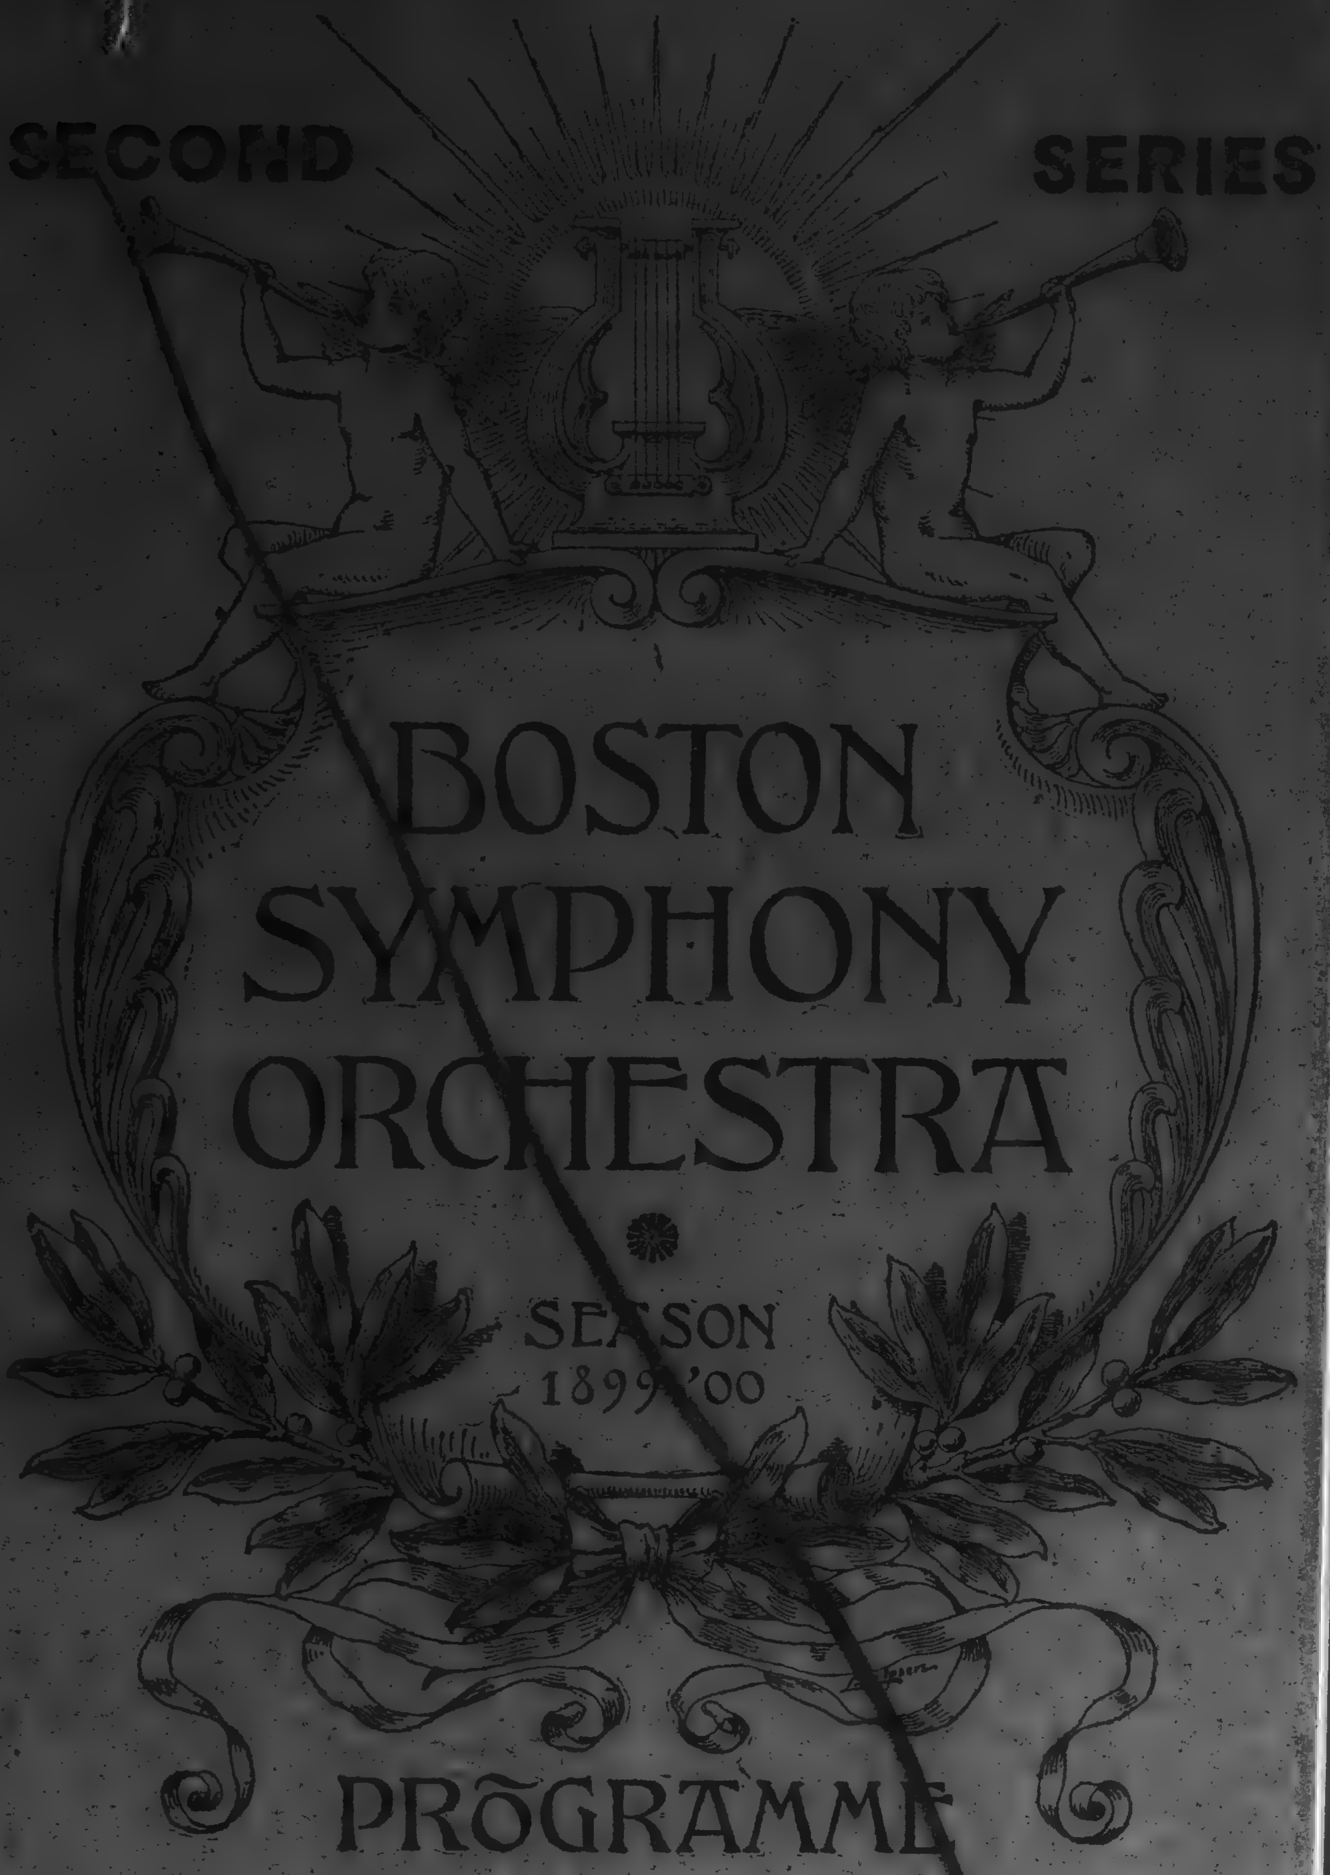
5

Tickets, with reserved seats,
on sale at Sanders & Stayman,
cor. Charles and Fayette Sts.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Saturday Evening, February 24, at 8.15 precisely.

SECOND SERIES



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC,
Friday Evening, February 23, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic
Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music
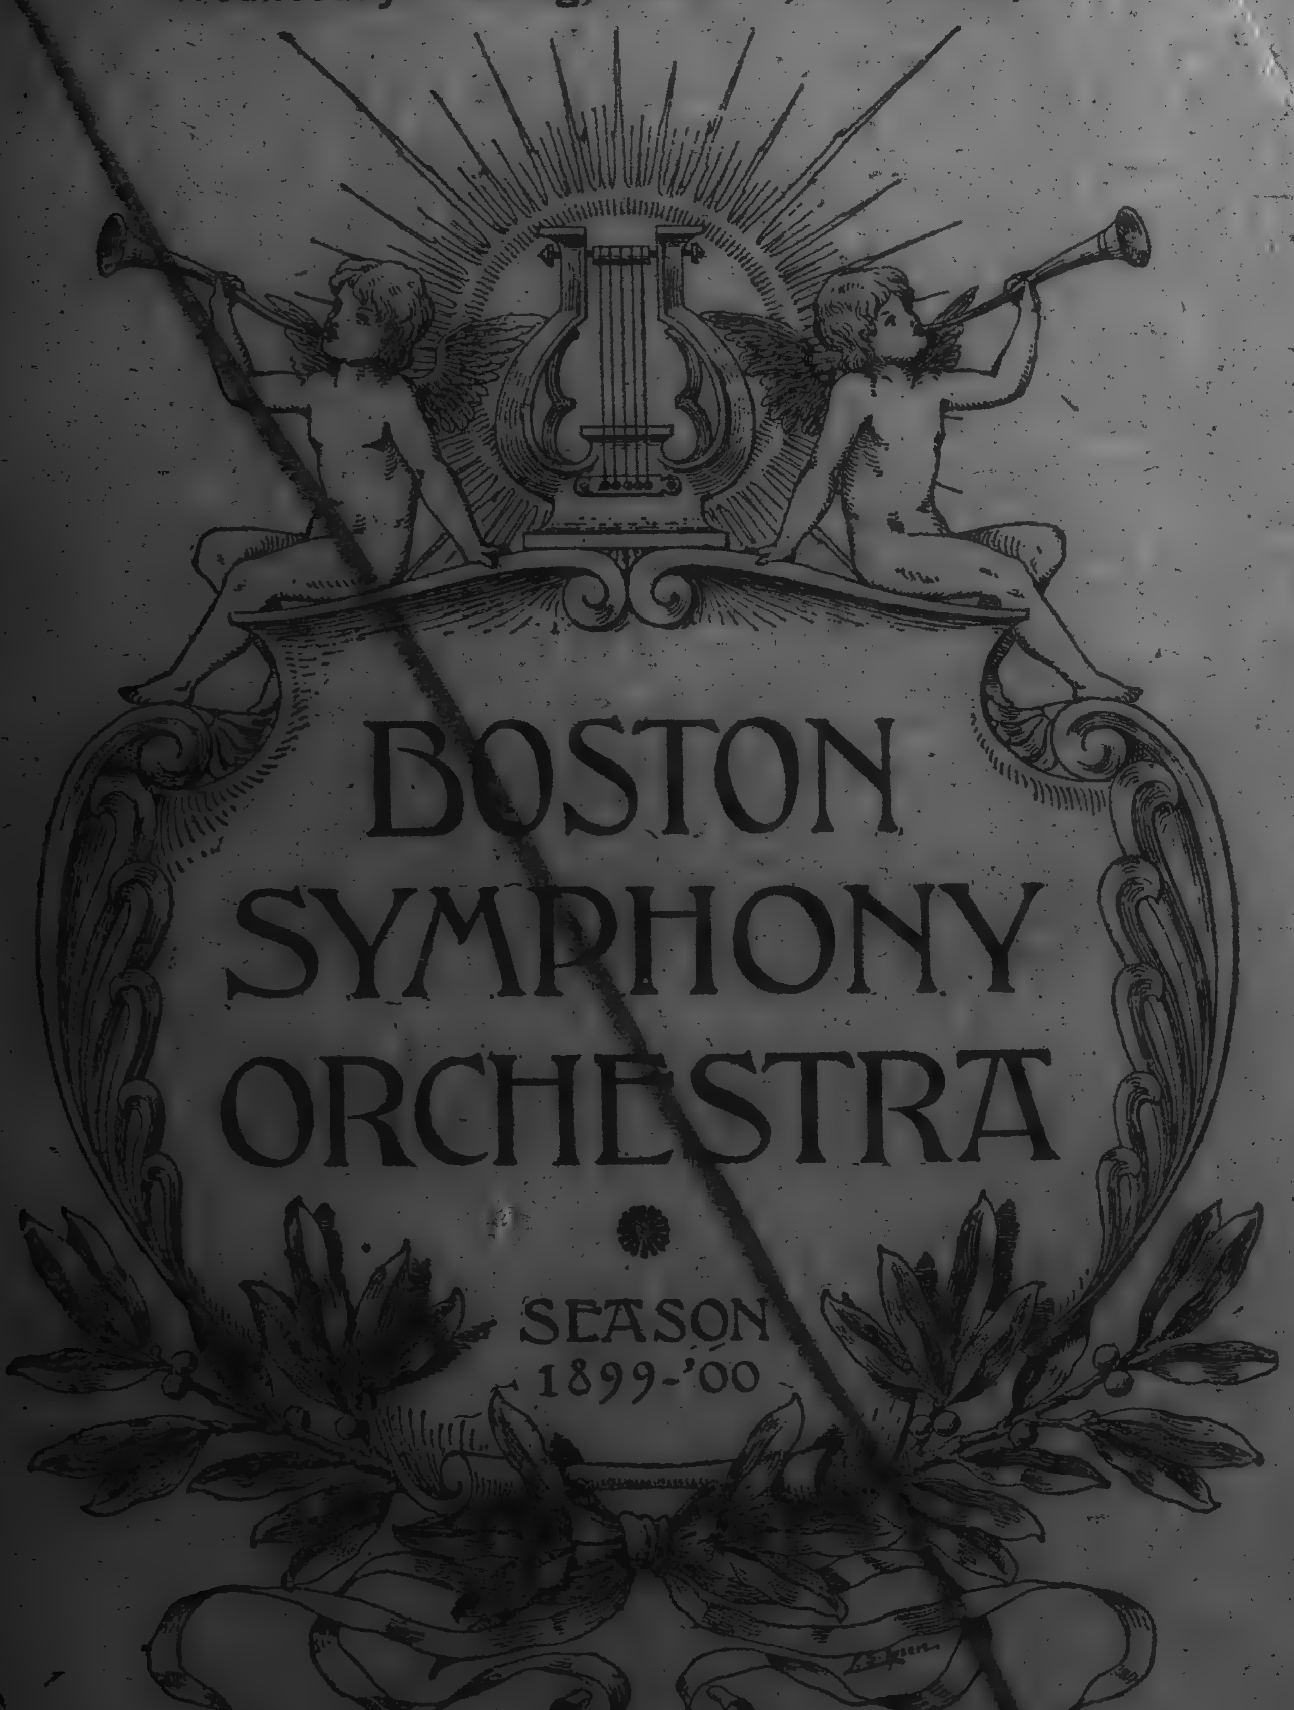
Store, 300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 7, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 1, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

CHERUBINI.	OVERTURE, "Anacreon," op. 241.
SAINT-SAËNS.	INTRODUCTION AND RONDO CAPRICCIOSO, for VIOLIN, op. 28.
CÉSAR FRANCK.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Les Éolides."

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di Menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. I. SCHNITZLER.

Tenth and last concert, Thursday Evening, March 15.
Eighth Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, March 13.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Saturday Evening, February 24, at 8.15 precisely.

SECOND SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

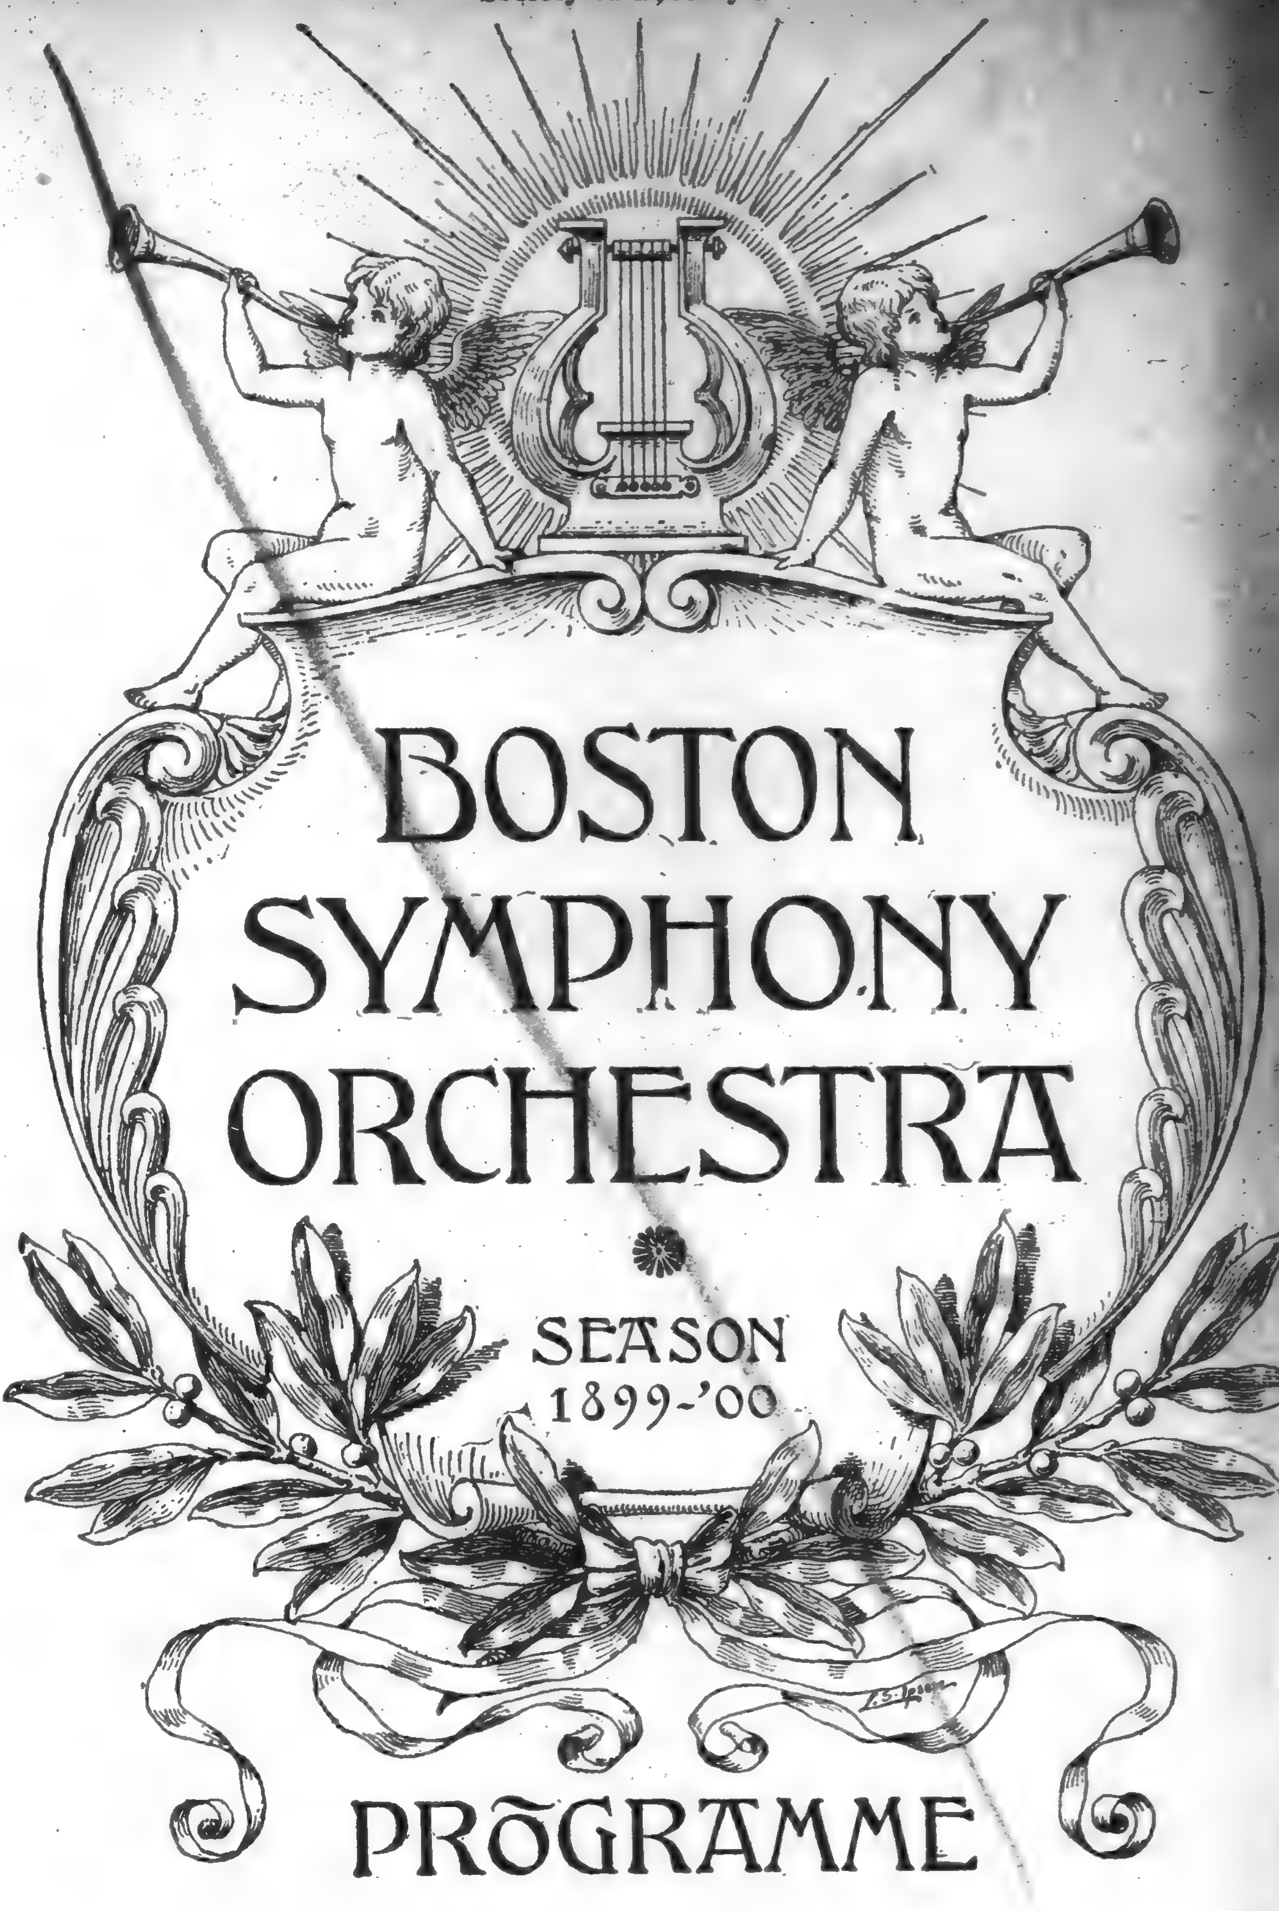
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - BROOKLYN.
Friday Evening, February 23, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 7, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY. MARCH 1, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

CHERUBINI.	OVERTURE, "Anacreon," op. 241.
SAINT-SAËNS.	INTRODUCTION AND RONDO CAPRICCIOSO, for VIOLIN, op. 28.
CÉSAR FRANCK.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Les Éolides."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93. I. Allegro vivace e con brio. II. Allegretto scherzando. III. Tempo di Menuetto. IV. Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. I. SCHNITZLER.

Tenth and last concert, Thursday Evening, March 15.
Eighth Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, March 13.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, February 19, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1899-'00
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE to GOETHE'S "Egmont," op. 84.
MENDELSSOHN.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in E minor, op. 64. I. Allegro molto appassionato. II. Andante. III. Allegretto non troppo. — Allegro molto vivace.
BRAHMS.	THREE HUNGARIAN DANCES, Nos. 1, 2 and 6. I. Allegro molto. II. Allegretto. VI. Vivace.

(Scored for ORCHESTRA by the COMPOSER and ALBERT PARLOW.)

MOSZKOWSKI.	FOUR MOVEMENTS FROM SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39. I. Allegro molto e brioso. II. Allegretto giojoso. III. Tema con Variazioni: Andante. V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace.

Soloist:

Miss LEONORA JACKSON.

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YOR
Wednesday Afternoon, February 21, at 2.30 precisely.
Thursday Evening, February 22, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1899-'00
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, February 20, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA
SEASON
1899-'00
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

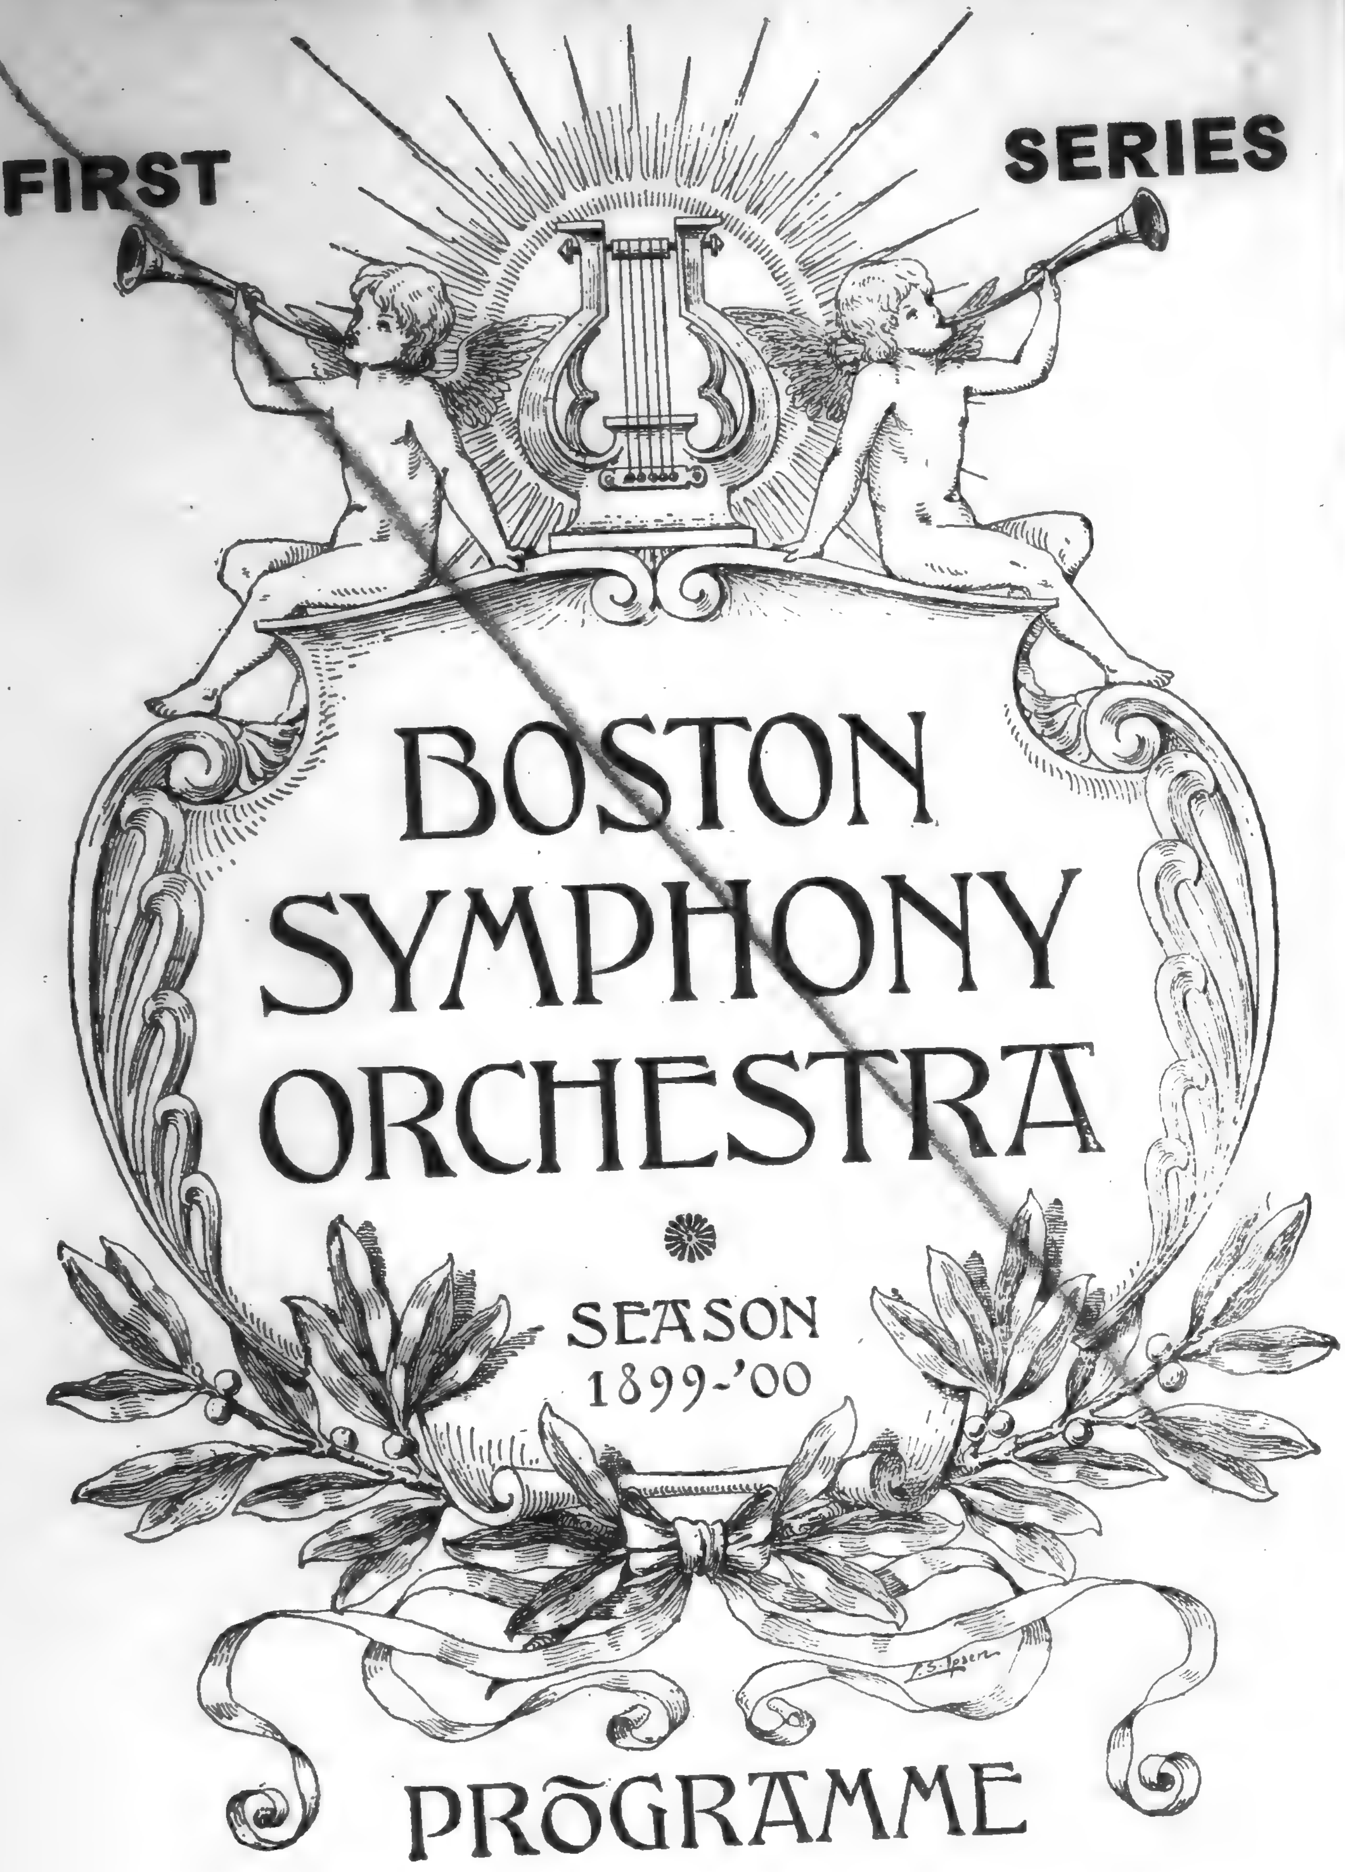
Tickets, with reserved seats,
on sale at Sanders & Stayman,
cor. Charles and Fayette Sts.

[112]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, February 19, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't. Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE to GOETHE'S "Egmont," op. 84.

MENDELSSOHN. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in E minor, op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo. — Allegro molto vivace.

BRAHMS. THREE HUNGARIAN DANCES, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.
I. Allegro molto.
II. Allegretto.
VI. Vivace.
(Scored for ORCHESTRA by the COMPOSER and ALBERT PARLOW.)

MOSZKOWSKI. FOUR MOVEMENTS FROM SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
I. [illegible]
II. Allegro giocoso.
III. Tema con Variazioni. Andante.
V. Perpetuum mobile. Vivace.

Soloist:

Miss LEONORA JACKSON.

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YOR
Wednesday Afternoon, February 21, at 2.30 precisely.
Thursday Evening, February 22, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

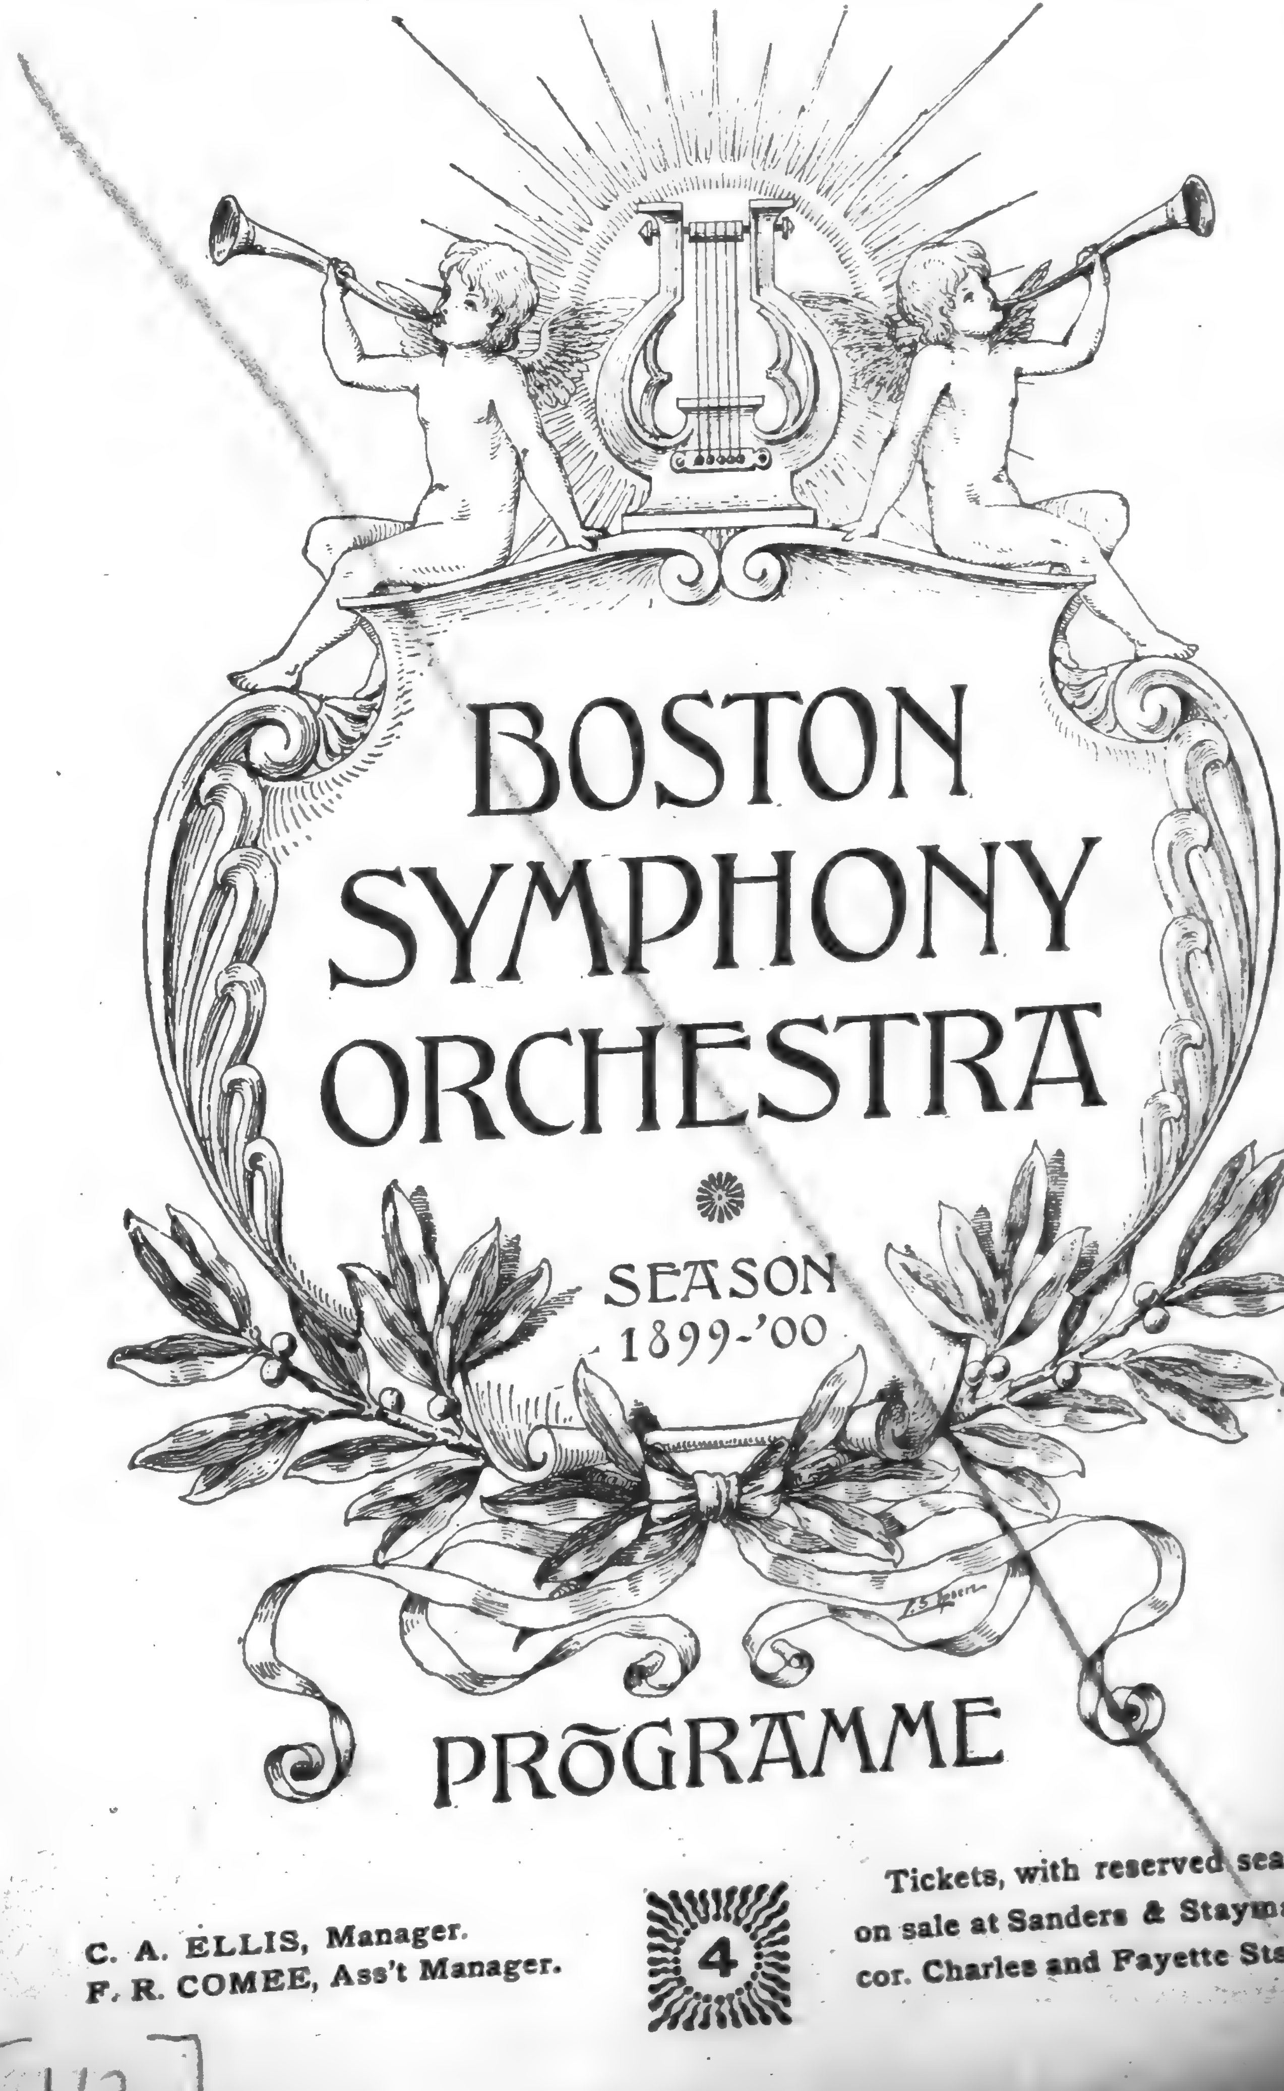
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, February 20, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats,
on sale at Sanders & Stayman,
cor. Charles and Fayette Sts.

[112]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, January 31, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

RUBIN GOLDMARK. OVERTURE, "Hiawatha."

MASSENET. ARIA, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade."

WAGNER. SIEGFRIED IDYLL.

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) CARRISSIMI. "Vittoria."
b) SECCHI. "Love me or not."
(Campion's "Book of Airs," 1617.)
c) BRAHMS. "Von Eurige Liebe."

MOSZKOWSKI. SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
I. Allegro molto e brioso.
II. Allegretto giojoso.
III. Tema con Variazioni: Andante.
IV. Intermezzo: Allegretto con moto.
V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. FRANCIS ROGERS.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

Fifth Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, January 30. Programme: Dittersdorf, Quartet in E-flat major; Schumann, Quartet in A minor, No. 1; Borodine, Quartet in A major. Tickets at Music Hall, Boston, at Sever's Bookstore, and at the door.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

MOSZKOWSKI. FOUR MOVEMENTS FROM SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
I. Allegro molto e brioso.
II. Allegretto giojoso.
III. Tema con Variazioni: Andante.
V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace.

MENDELSSOHN. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in E minor, op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo. — Allegro molto vivace.

BRAHMS. THREE HUNGARIAN DANCES, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.
I. Allegro molto.
II. Allegretto.
VI. Vivace.
(Scored for ORCHESTRA by the COMPOSER and ALBERT PARLOW.)

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di Menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.

Wrong

Soloist:

~~Miss LEONORA JACKSON.~~

[113]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT. UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

CHOPIN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in F minor, op. 21.
I. Maestoso.
II. Larghetto.
III. Allegro vivace.

GRIEG. SYMPHONIC DANCES, op. 64.
I. Allegro moderato e marcato. — Più lento,
II. Allegretto grazioso. — Più mosso.
III. Allegro giocoso. — L'Istesso tempo.
IV. Andante. — Allegro molto e risoluto, — Più tranquillo.

Soloist:

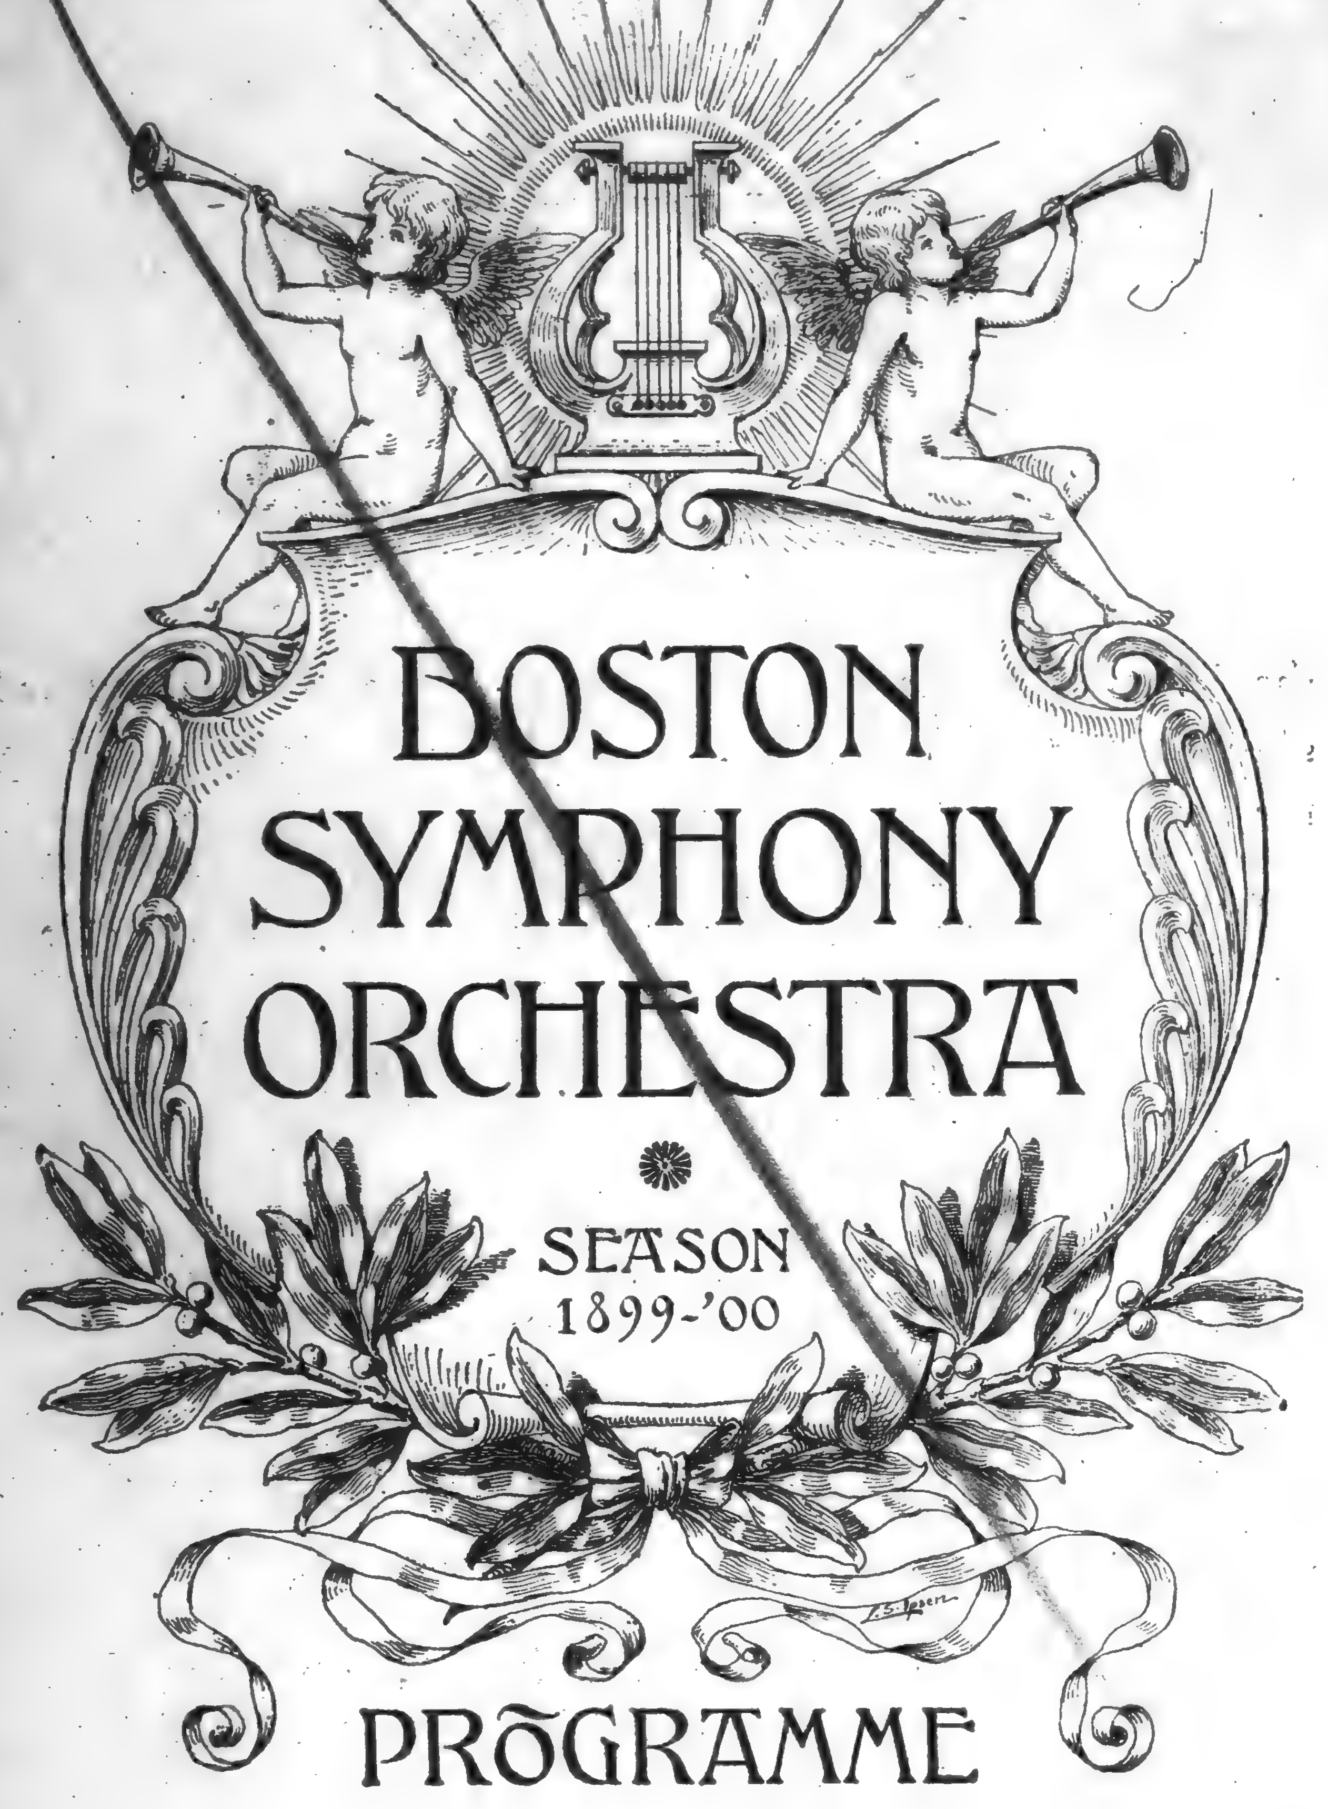
Miss SUZA DOANE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

Sixth Harvard University Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, February 13. Programme: Beethoven, Quartet, in C-sharp minor, op. 131; Beach, Soli for Pianoforte; Brahms, Quintet for Piano and Strings. Soloist, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, January 31, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

RUBIN GOLDMARK. OVERTURE, "Hiawatha."

MASSENET. ARIA, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade."

WAGNER. SIEGFRIED IDYLL.

SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) CARRISSIMI. "Vittoria."
b) SECCHI. "Love me or not."
(Campion's "Book of Airs," 1617.)
c) BRAHMS. "Von Eurige Liebe."

MOSZKOWSKI. SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
I. Allegro molto e brioso.
II. Allegretto giojoso.
III. Tema con Variazioni: Andante.
IV. Intermezzo: Allegretto con moto.
V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. FRANCIS ROGERS

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

Fifth Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, January 30. Programme: Dittersdorf, Quartet in E-flat major; Schumann, Quartet in A minor, No. 1; Borodine, Quartet in A major. Tickets at Music Hall, Boston, at Sever's Bookstore, and at the door.

Academy of Music, Fall River.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

CONCERT.

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 14, AT 8, P.M.

Programme.

MOSZKOWSKI. FOUR MOVEMENTS FROM SUITE No. 1, in F major, op. 39.
I. Allegro molto e brioso.
II. Allegretto giojoso.
III. Tema con Variazioni: Andante.
V. Perpetuum mobile: Vivace.

MENDELSSOHN. CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in E minor, op. 64.
I. Allegro molto appassionato.
II. Andante.
III. Allegretto non troppo. — Allegro molto vivace.

BRAHMS. THREE HUNGARIAN DANCES, Nos 1, 2 and 6.
I. Allegro molto.
II. Allegretto.
VI. Vivace.
(Scored for ORCHESTRA by the COMPOSER and ALBERT PARLOW.)

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.
I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
II. Allegretto scherzando.
III. Tempo di Menuetto.
IV. Allegro vivace.

Wrong

Soloist:

Miss LEONORA JACKSON

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 8, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT. UNFINISHED SYMPHONY, in B minor.
I. Allegro moderato.
II. Andante con moto.

CHOPIN. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in F minor, op. 21.
I. Maestoso.
II. Larghetto.
III. Allegro vivace.

GRIEG. SYMPHONIC DANCES, op. 64.
I. Allegro moderato e marcato. — Più lento.
II. Allegretto grazioso. — Più mosso.
III. Allegro giocoso. — L'Istesso tempo.
IV. Andante. — Allegro molto e risoluto, — Più tranquillo.

Soloist:

Miss SUZA DOANE.

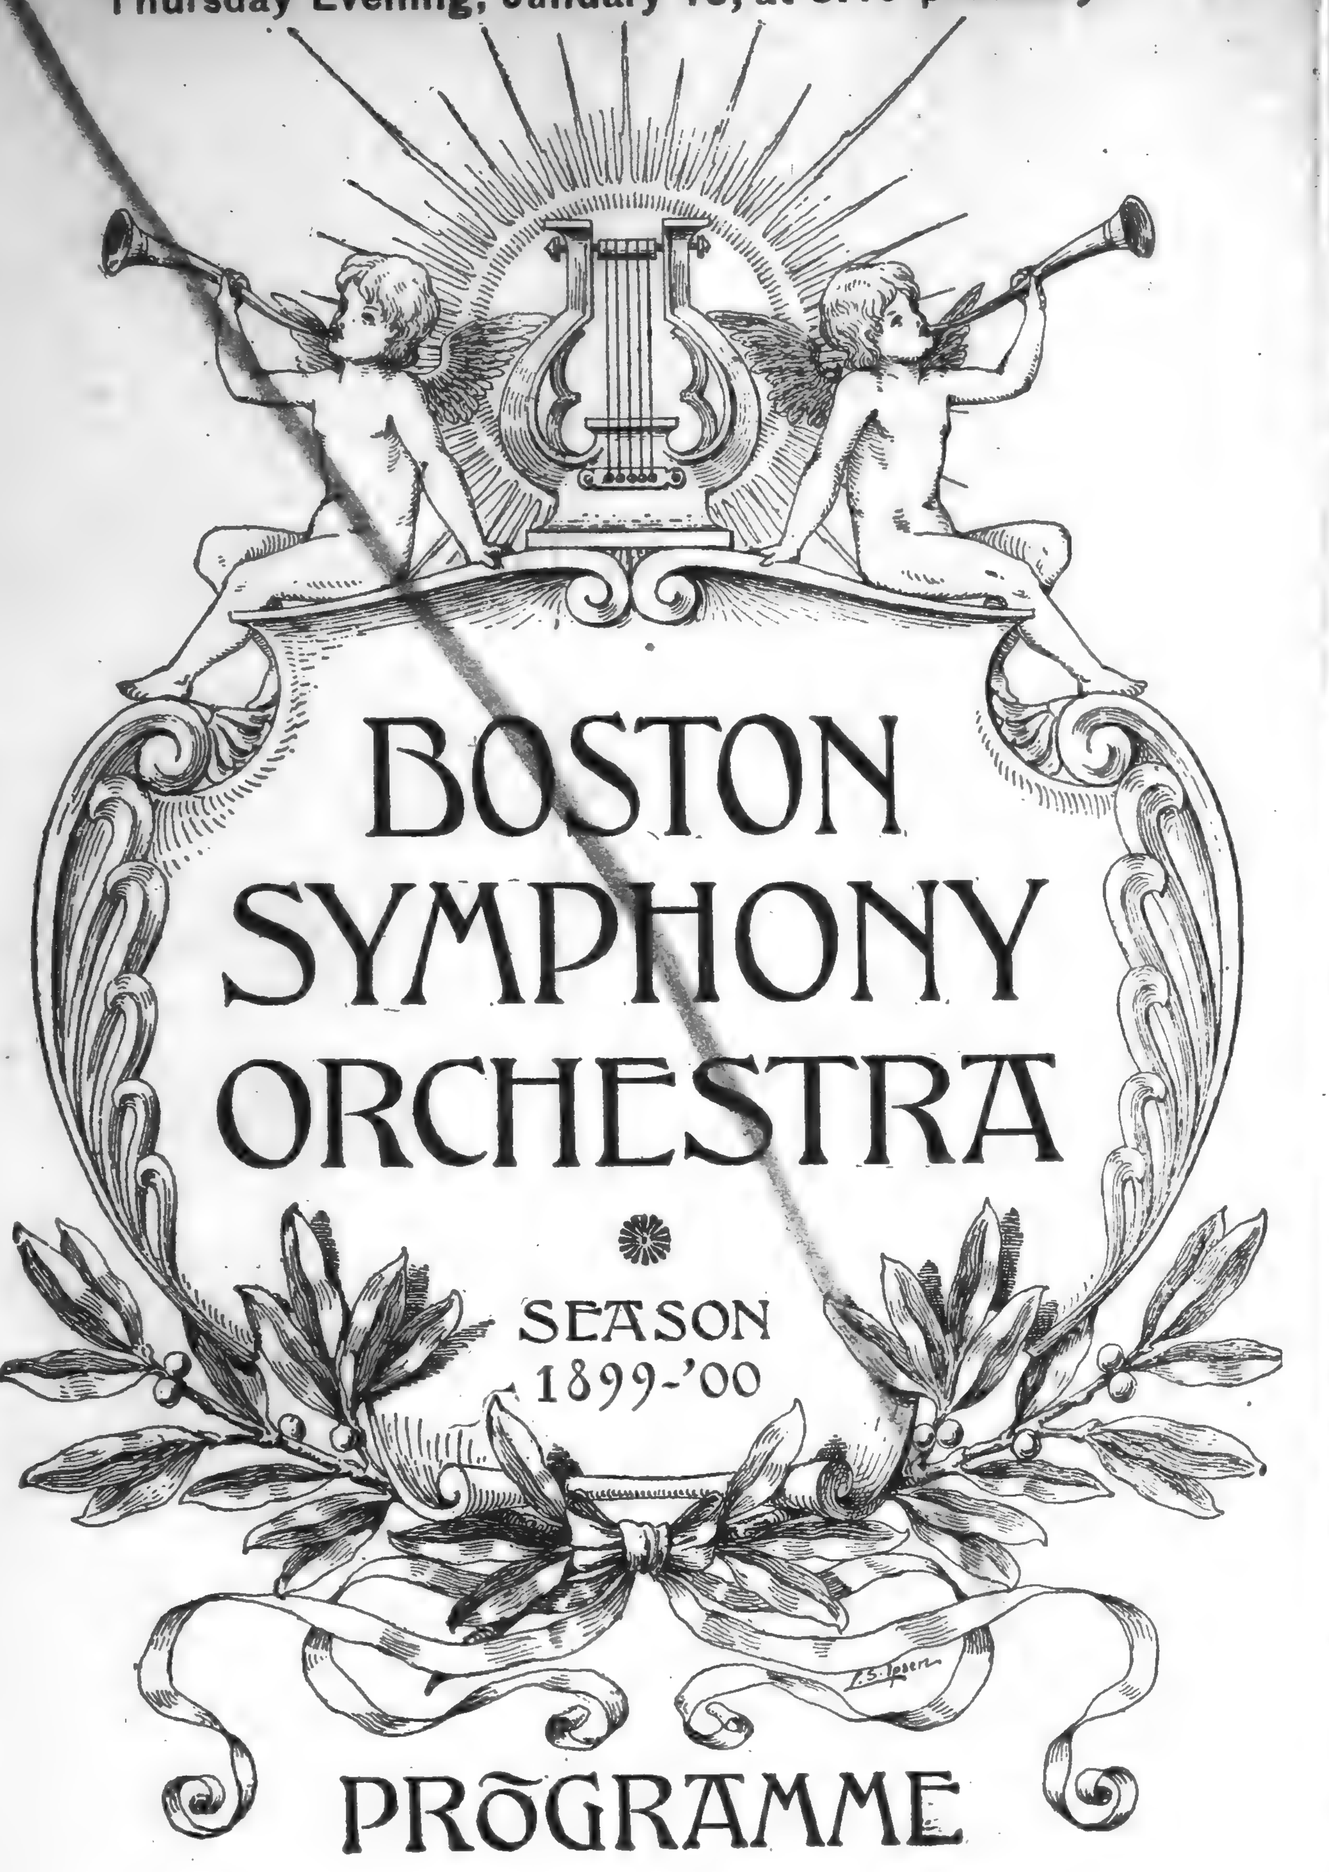
The Pianoforte is a Steinway

Sixth Harvard University Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, February 13. Programme: Beethoven, Quartet, in C-sharp minor, op. 131; Beach, Soli for Pianoforte; Brahms, Quintet for Piano and Strings. Soloist, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

[113]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, January 17, at 2.30 precisely.
Thursday Evening, January 18, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 3 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, January 16, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Sanders & Stayman, cor. Charles and Fayette Sts.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - - BROOKLYN.
Saturday Evening, January 20, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Friday Evening, January 19, at 8.15 precisely.

SECOND SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

[114]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE to GOETHE'S "Egmont," op. 84.
C. M. LOEFFLER.	"LES VEILLÉES DE L'UKRAINE." Morceau de Concert pour VIOLON et ORCHESTRE. I. Introduction: Andantino.—Pastorale: Allegro moderato. II. Une Nuit de Mar (La Noyée—Runa): Lento. IV. Les Parobki s'amusent: Allegro giocoso.
BERLIOZ.	THREE MOVEMENTS from the DRAMATIC SYMPHONY, "Roméo et Juliette." op. 17. I. ROMEO SEUL; GRAND FETE CHEZ CAPULET: Andante malinconico e sostenuto.— Larghetto espressivo —Allegro. II. SCENE D'AMOUR: Adagio. III. LA FEE MAB. Scherzo: Prestissimo.—Trio: Allegretto.
LISZT.	RHAPSODIE HONGROISE, No. 1, in F.

Soloist:

Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

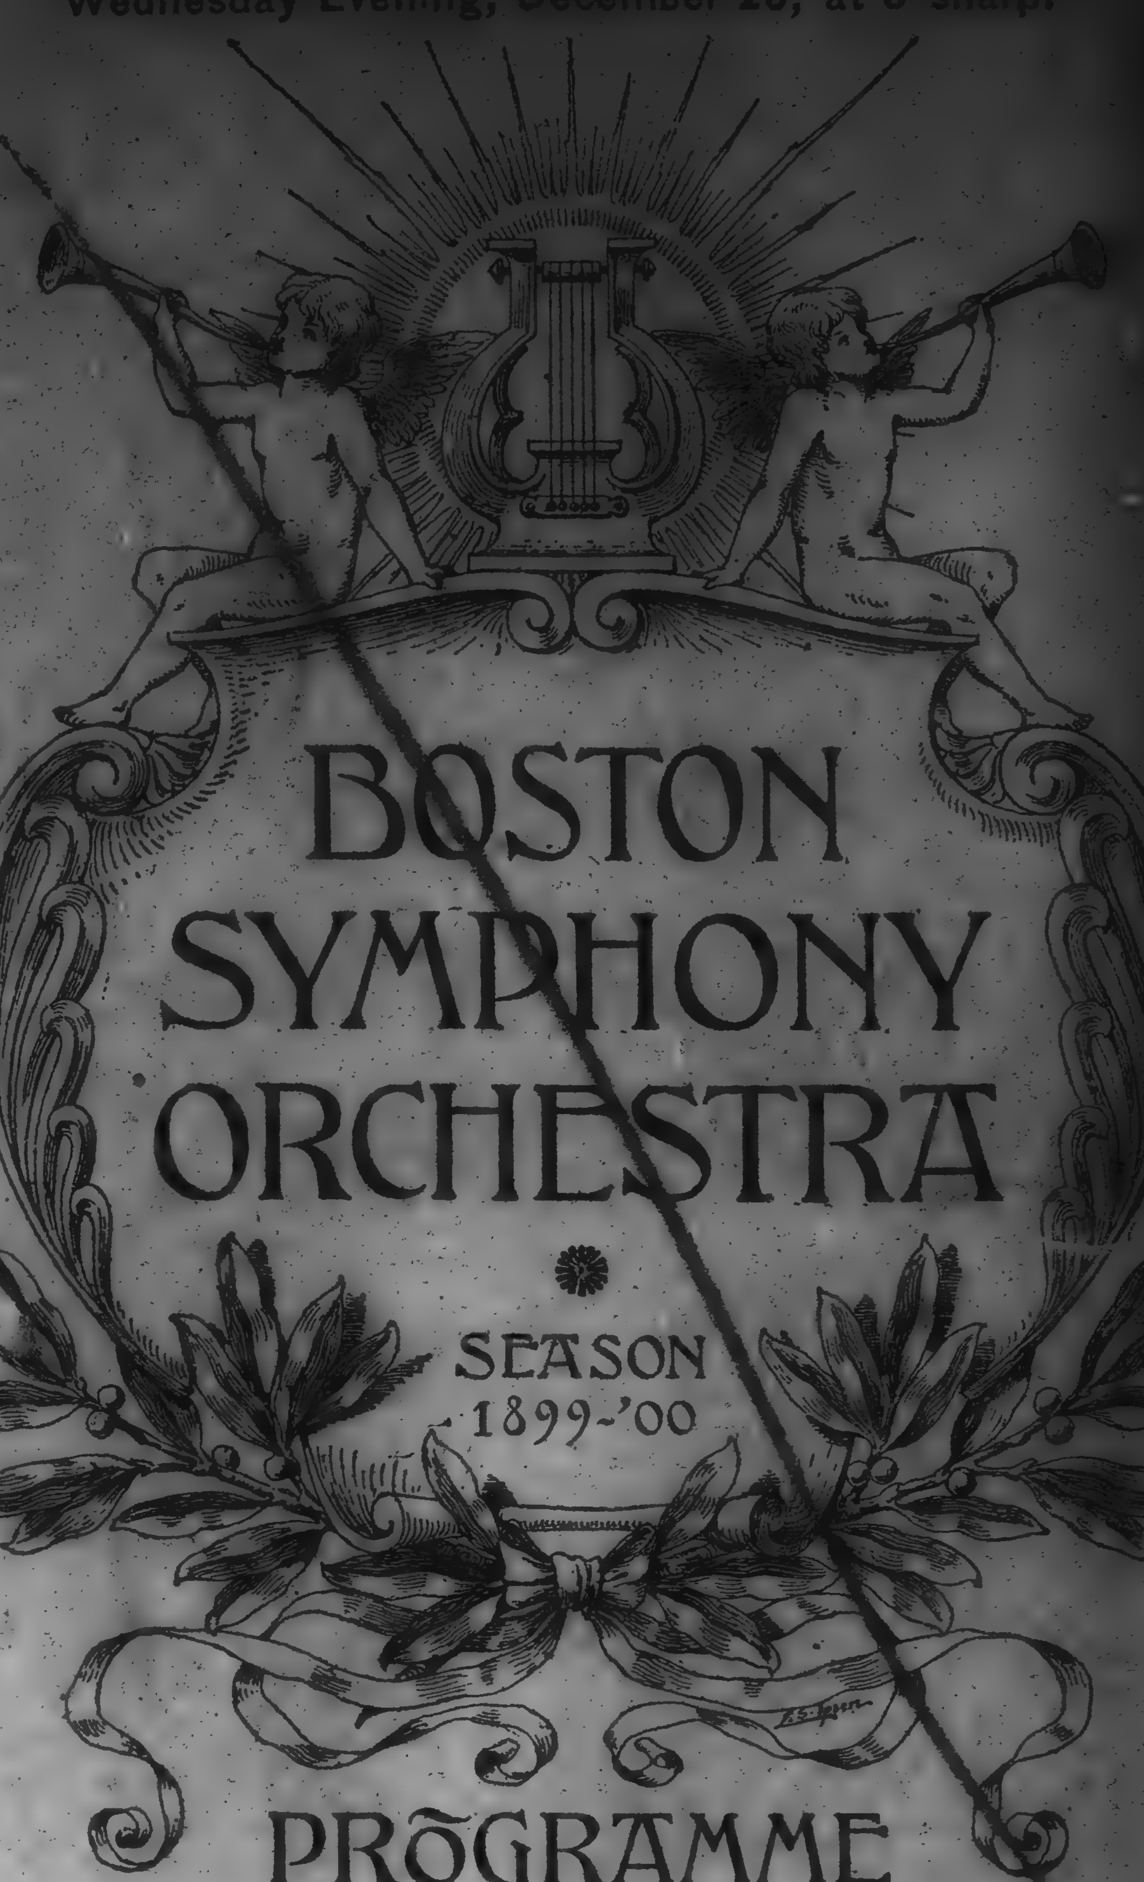
Sixth Concert, Thursday Evening, January 11.

IV. Harvard University Chamber Concert Tuesday Evening, January 9, 1900. The Kneisel Quartet, and Mme. Hopekirk, Soloist. Tickets at box office, Music Hall and at University Bookstore.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDE

Wednesday Evening, December 20, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1899-'00

PROGRAMME

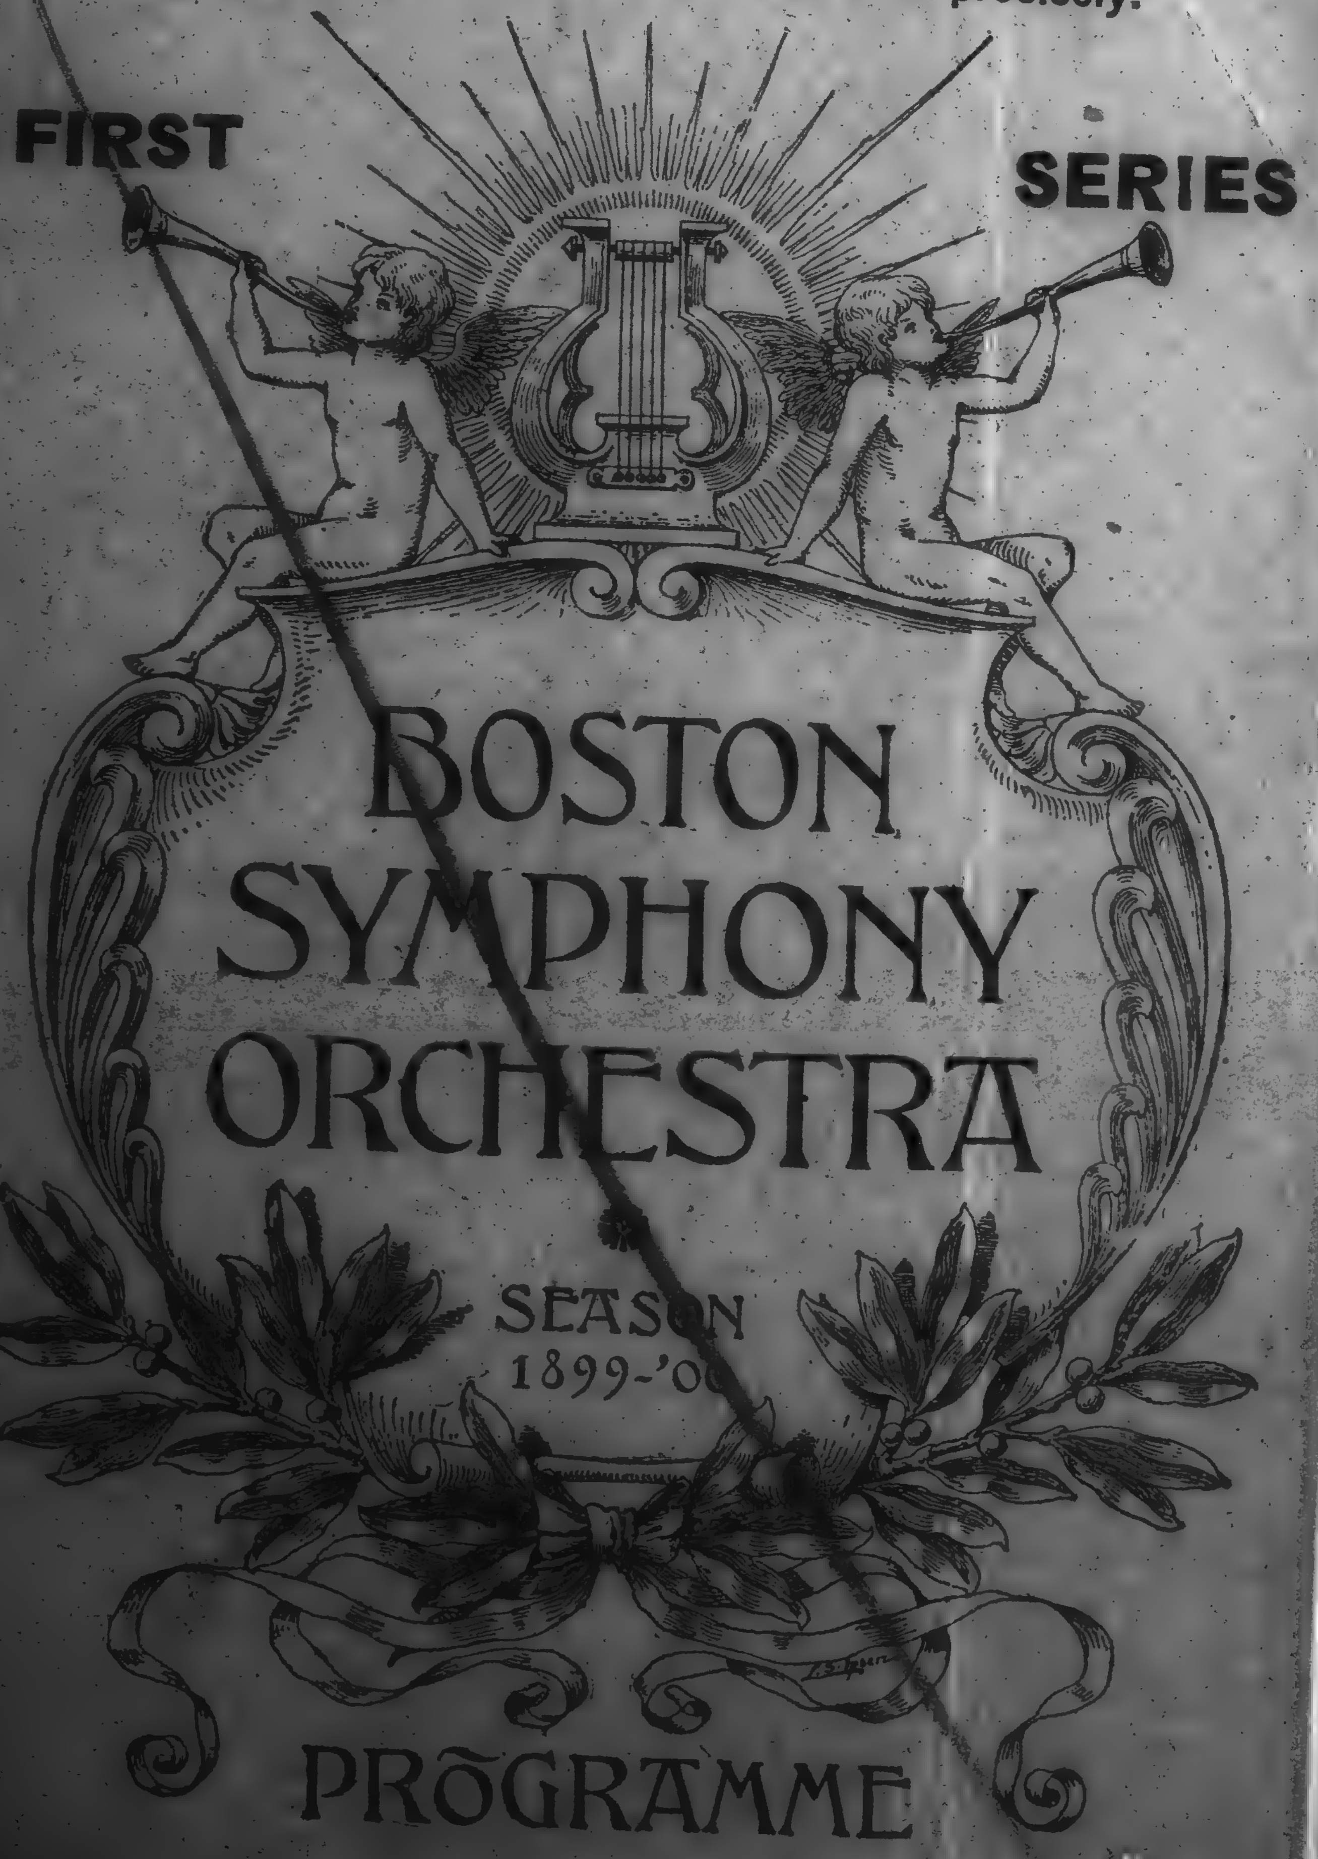
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight concerts, and single tickets at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, January 15, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1899-'00

PROGRAMME

A. ELLIS, Manager.
R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	TRAGIC OVERTURE, op. 81.
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23. I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. — Allegro con spirito. II. Andantino semplice. — Allegro vivace assai. III. Allegro con fuoco.
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in F major (Pastorale), op. 68. I. THE AWAKENING OF CHEERFUL FEELINGS ON ARRIVING IN THE COUNTRY: Allegro ma non troppo. II. SCENE BY THE BROOKSIDE: Andante molto mosso. III. MERRY MEETING OF COUNTRY FOLK: Allegro. IV. THUNDERSTORM, TEMPEST: Allegro. V. SHEPHERDS' SONG. GLAD AND THANKFUL FEELINGS AFTER THE STORM: Allegretto.

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Fifth Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, January 30. Kneisel Quartet.

[115]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 28, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN. OVERTURE to GOETHE'S "Egmont," op. 84.

C. M. LOEFFLER. "LES VEILLÉES DE L'UKRAINE."
Morceau de Concert pour VIOLON et ORCHESTRE.
I. Introduction: Andantino.—Pastorale: Allegro moderato.
II. Une Nuit de Mar (La Noyée—Runa): Lento.
IV. Les Parobki s'amusent: Allegro giocoso.

BERLIOZ. THREE MOVEMENTS from the DRAMATIC SYMPHONY, "Roméo et Juliette." op. 17.
I. ROMEO SEUL; GRAND FETE CHEZ CAPULET: Andante malinconico e sostenuto.— Larghetto espressivo —Allegro.
II. SCENE D'AMOUR: Adagio.
III. LA FEE MAB. Scherzo: Prestissimo.—Trio: Allegretto.

LISZT. RHAPSODIE HONGROISE, No. 1, in F.

Soloist:

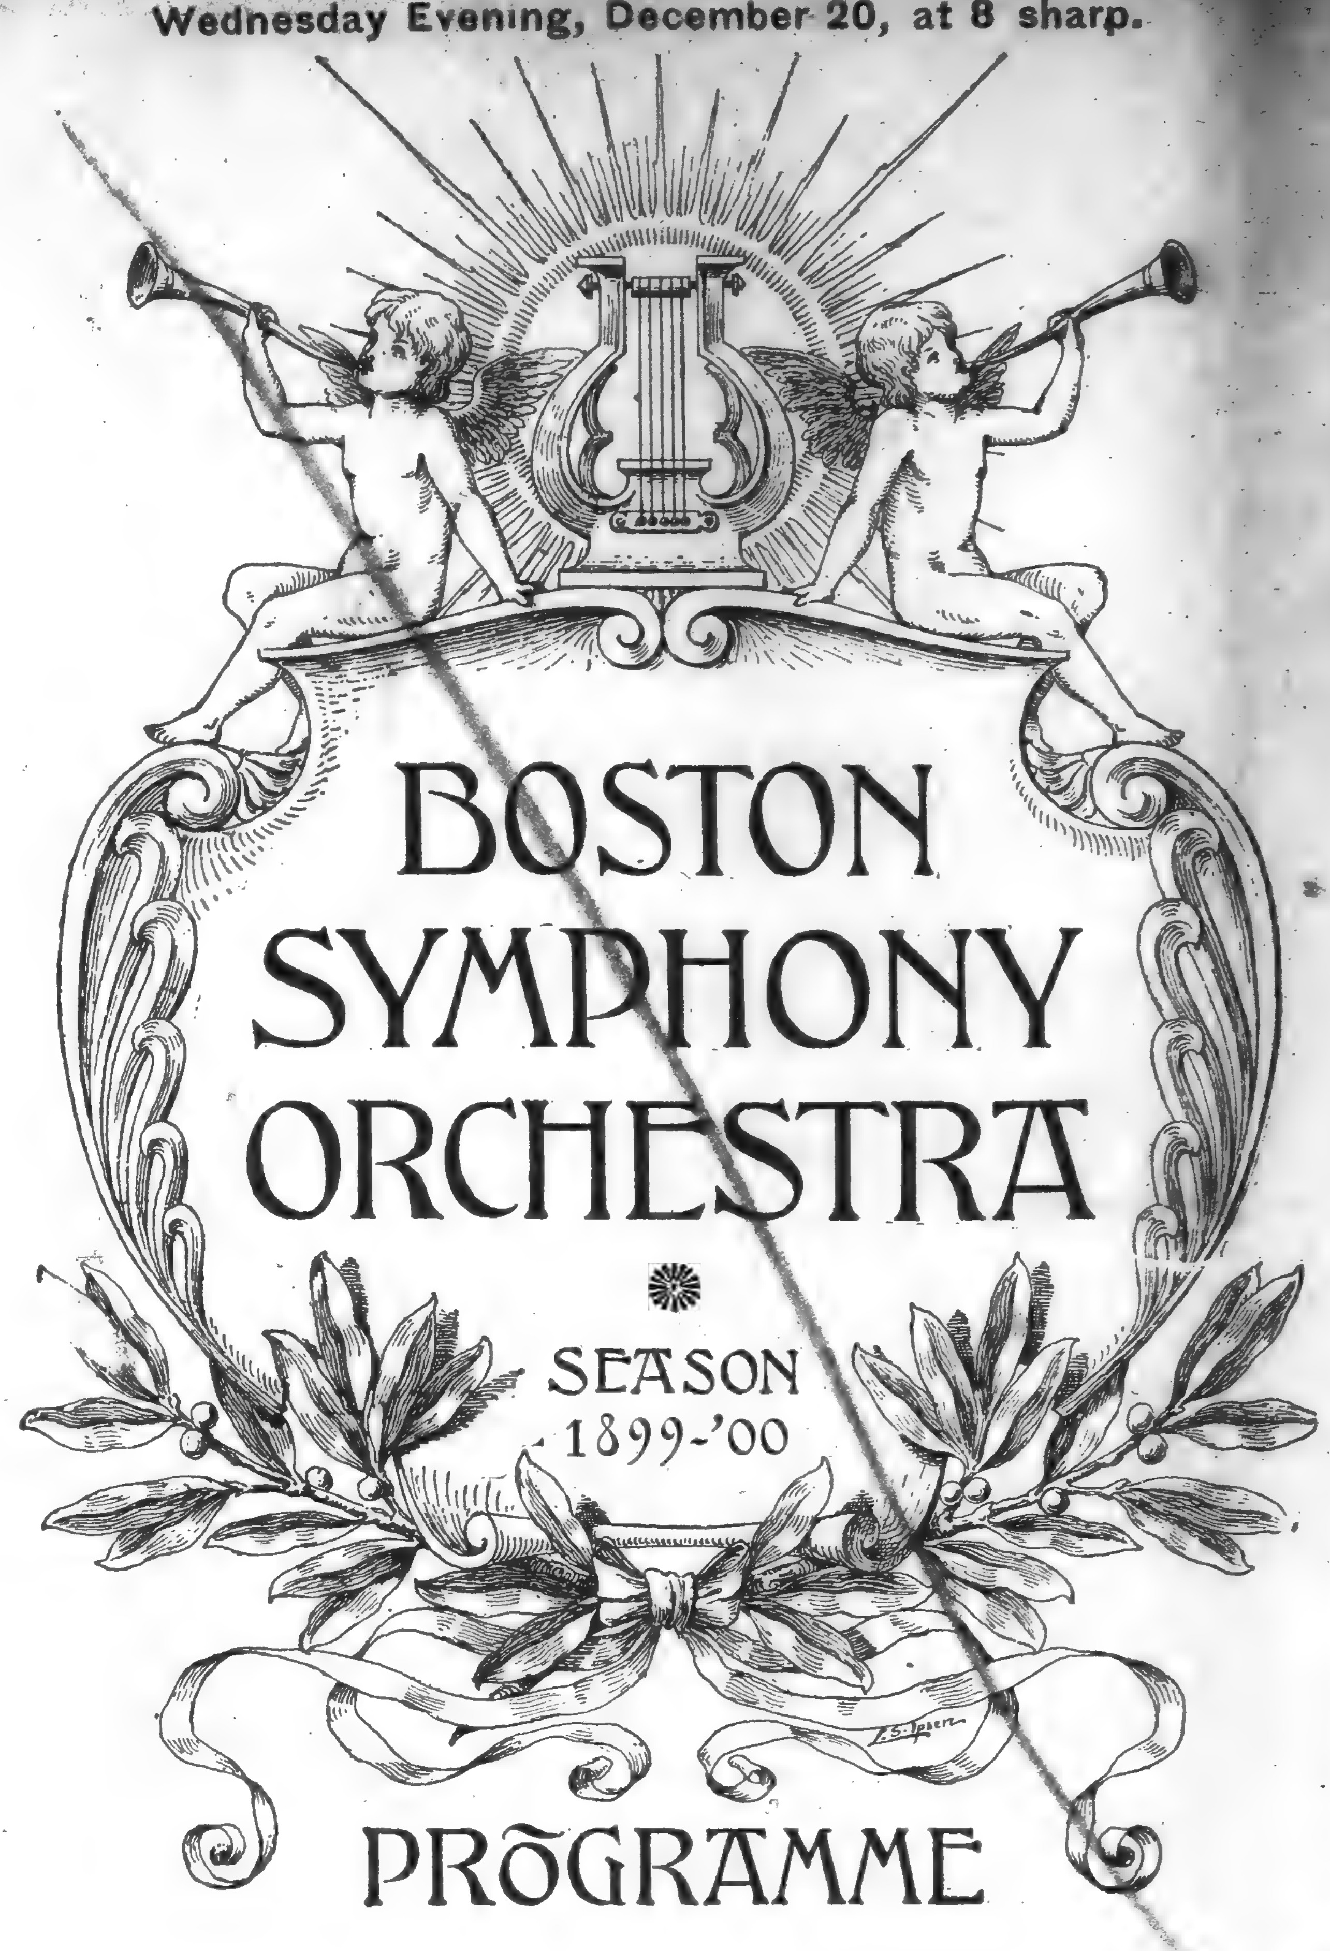
Mr. FRANZ KNEISEL.

Sixth Concert, Thursday Evening, January 11.

IV. Harvard University Chamber Concert Tuesday Evening, January 9, 1900. The Kneisel Quartet, and Mme. Hopekirk, Soloist. Tickets at box office, Music Hall and at University Bookstore.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, December 20, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight concerts, and single tickets at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, January 15, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

BRAHMS. TRAGIC OVERTURE, op. 81.

TCHAIKOVSKY. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23.
I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. — Allegro con spirito.
II. Andantino semplice. — Allegro vivace assai.
III. Allegro con fuoco.

BEETHOVEN. SYMPHONY No. 6, in F major (Pastorale), op. 68.
I. THE AWAKENING OF CHEERFUL FEELINGS ON ARRIVING IN THE COUNTRY: Allegro ma non troppo.
II. SCENE BY THE BROOKSIDE: Andante molto mosso.
III. MERRY MEETING OF COUNTRY FOLK: Allegro.
IV. THUNDERSTORM, TEMPEST: Allegro.
V. SHEPHERDS' SONG. GLAD AND THANKFUL FEELINGS AFTER THE STORM: Allegretto.

Soloist:

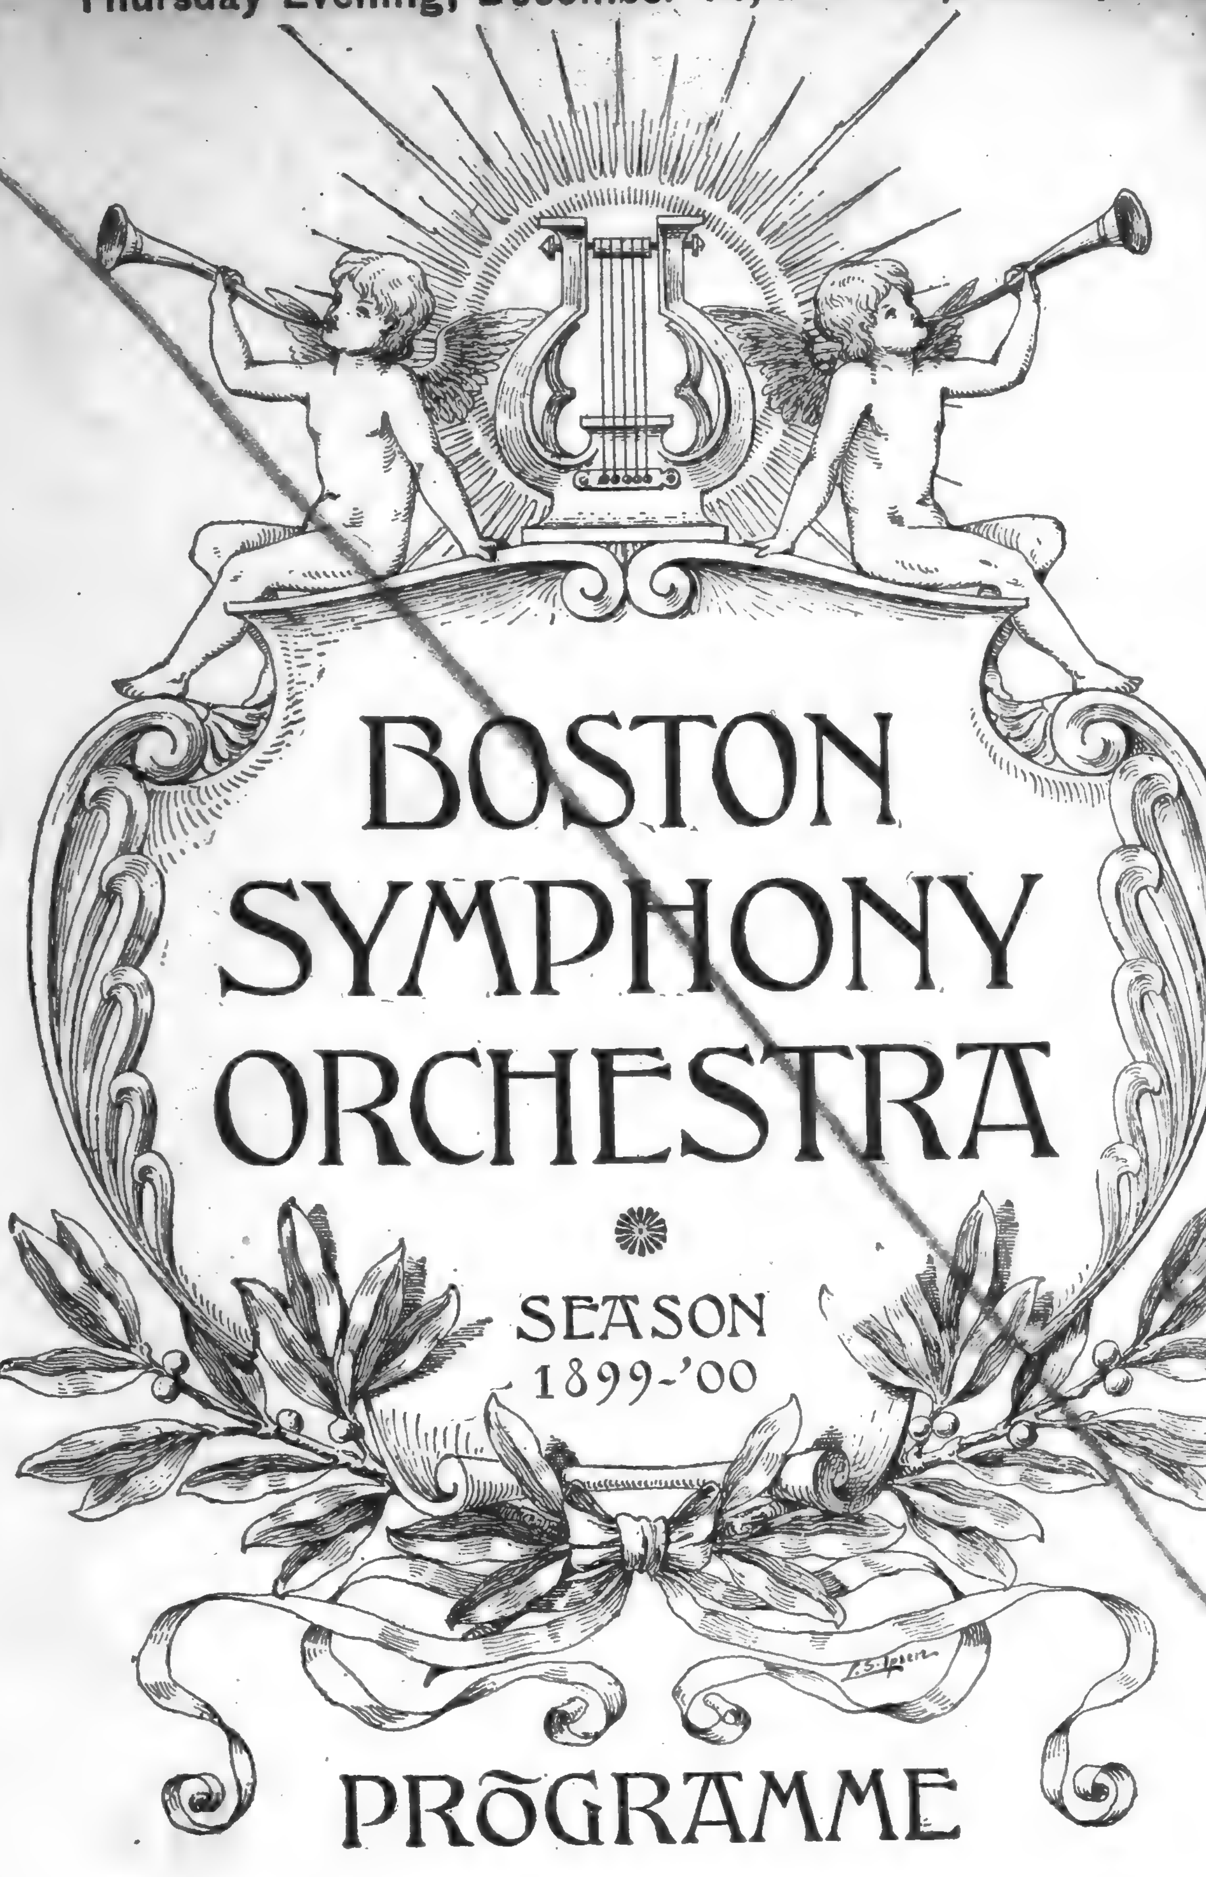
Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Fifth Chamber Concert, Tuesday Evening, January 30. Kneisel Quartet.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, December 13, at 2.30 precisely.
Thursday Evening, December 14, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, December 12, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

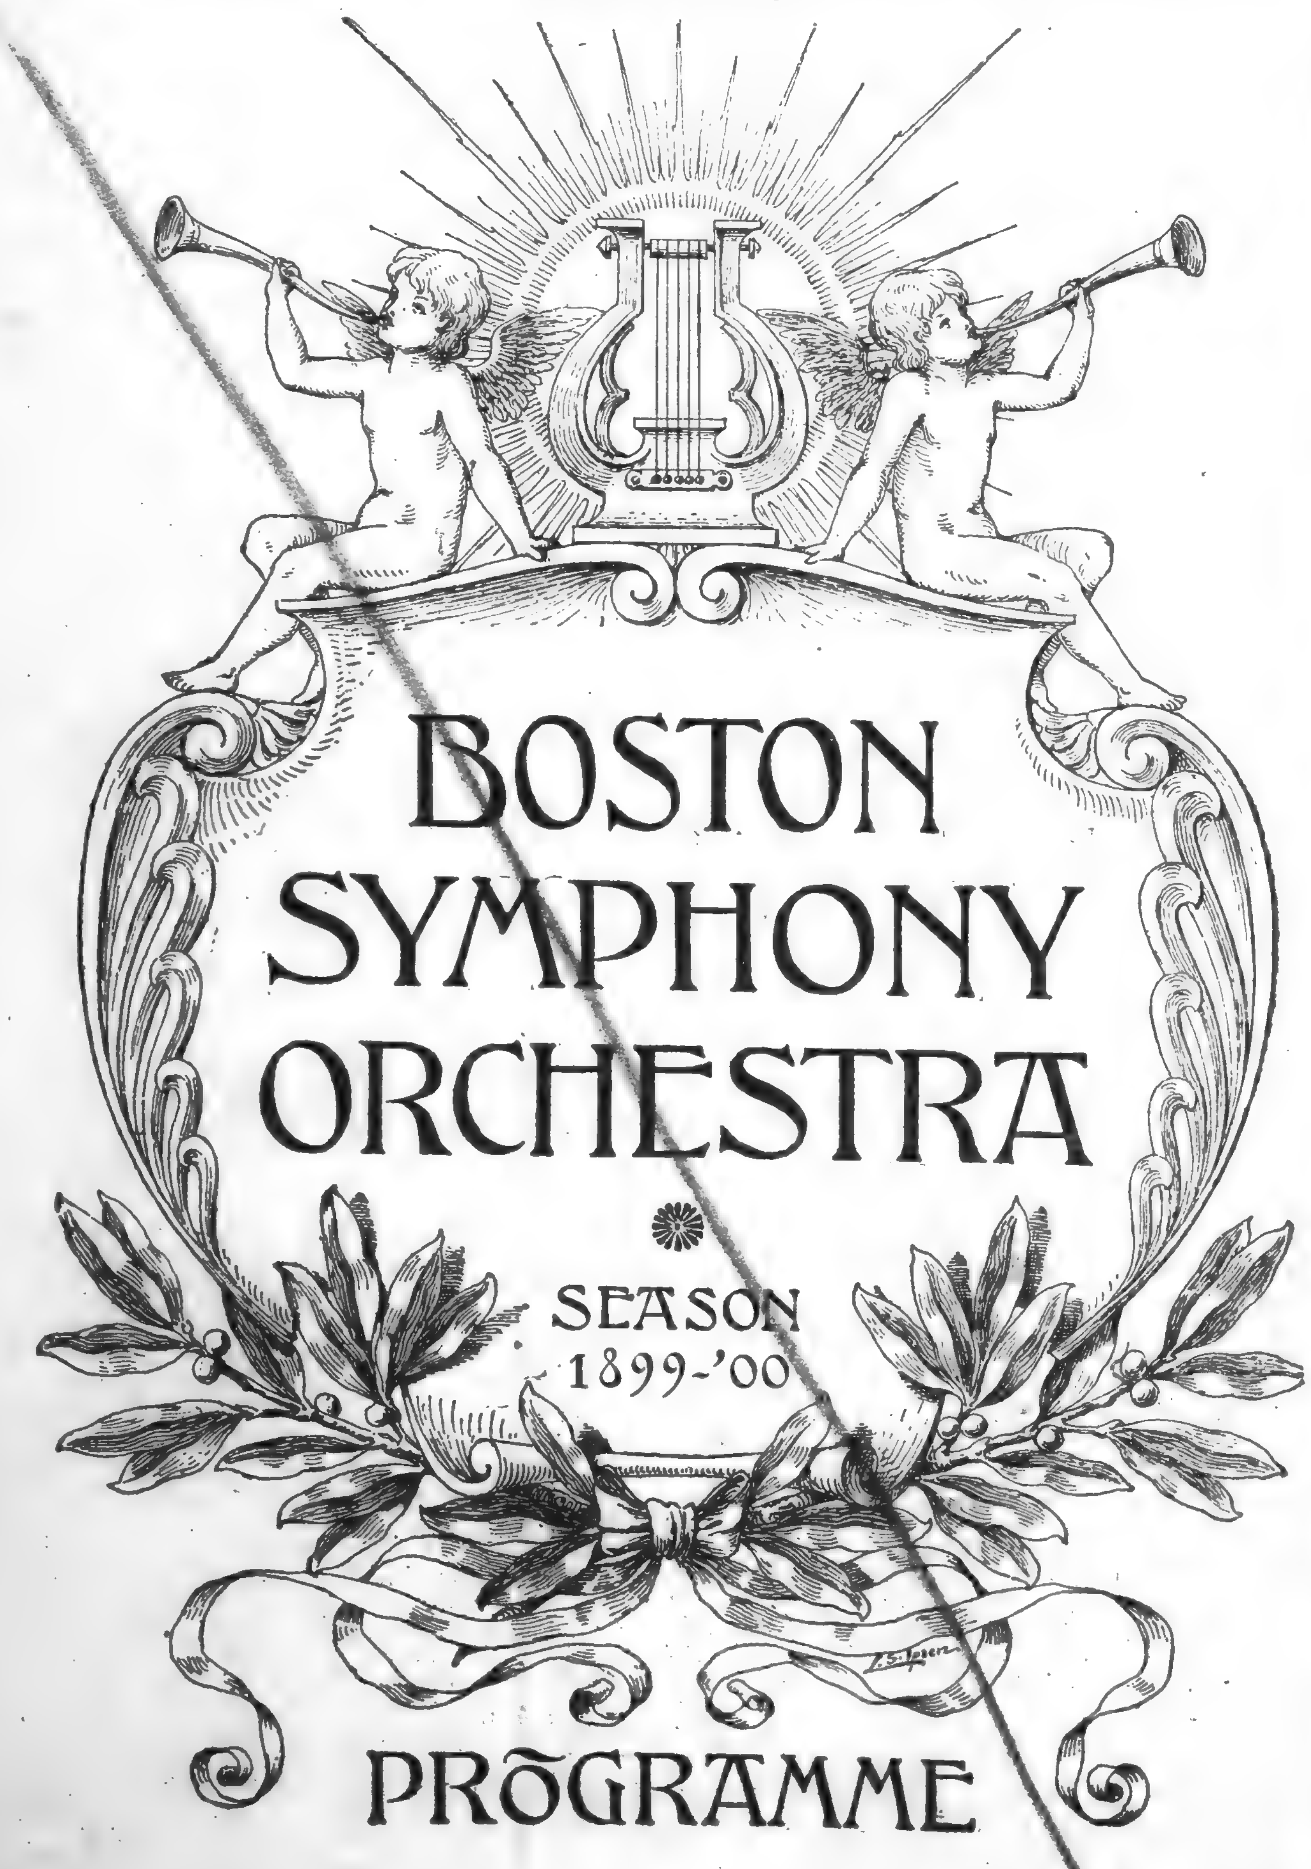
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Sanders & Stayman, cor. Charles and Fayette Sts.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - - BROOKLYN.
Saturday Evening, December 16, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Friday Evening, December 15, at 8.15 precisely.

SECOND SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at Blasius', 1103 Chestnu

[116]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE to the Legend, "Die schöne Melusine," op. 32.
MOZART.	ARIA, "L'Amero," from "Il re Pastore."
HUMPERDINCK.	MOORISH RHAPSODY. I. TARIFA, Elegie bei Sonnenaufgang: Langsam. II. TANGER, Eine Nacht im Mohren-Café: Lebhaft. III. TETUAN, Ein Ritt in die Wüste: Mässig schnell. (First time at these Concerts.)
BELLINI.	ARIA, "Casta Diva," from "Norma."
WILHELM BERGER.	SYMPHONY, in B-flat major, op. 71. I. Lebhaft (Vivace). II. Sehr lebhaft (Molto vivace). III. Langsam (Andante). IV. Sehr lebhaft (Molto vivace). (First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

Mrs. MARIAN TITUS.

Fourth Concert, Thursday evening, December 7. Programme: Marschner, Overture, "Hans Heiling"; Schumann, Concerto for Pianoforte; Rontgen, Norwegian Ballad; Beethoven, Symphony No. 2. Soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

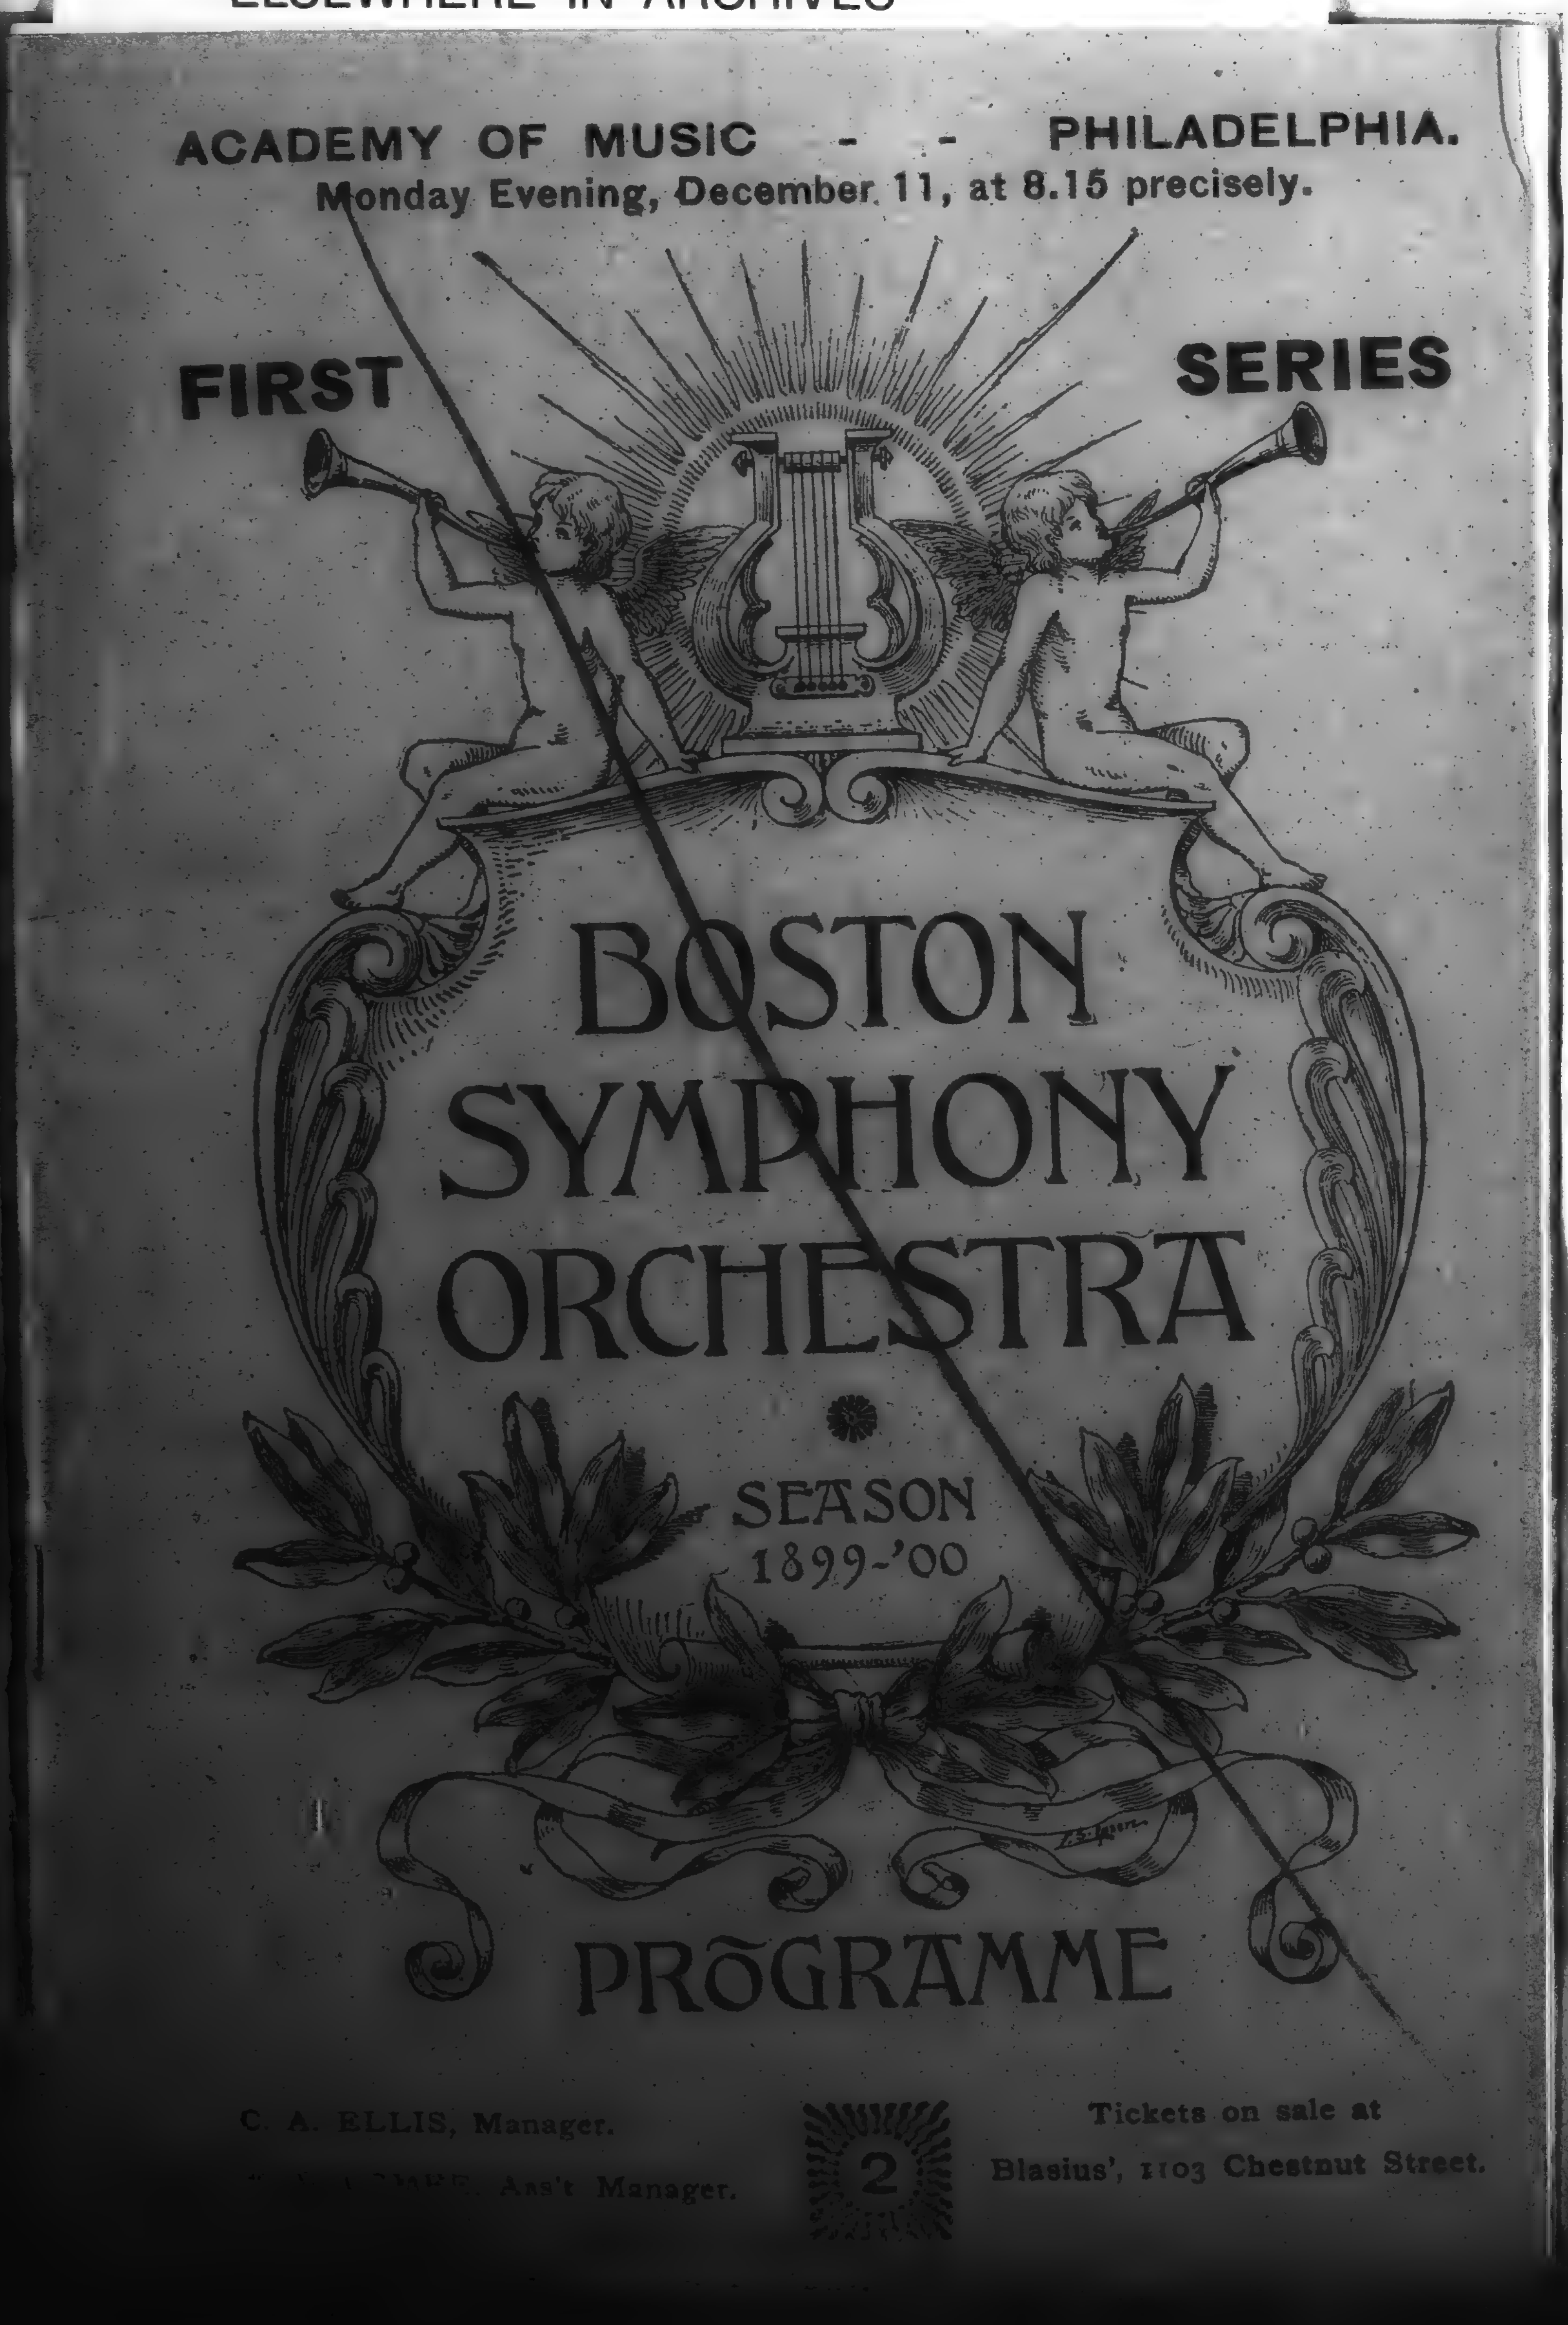
GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, zum "Gefesselten Prometheus" von Aeschylos, op. 38.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in C minor. Allegro con brio. Largo. Rondo. Allegro.
J. S. BACH.	CHACONNE, in D minor. (Scored for ORCHESTRA by RAFF.)
GLAZOUNOFF.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in C minor, op. 58. I. Adagio. — Allegro passionato. II. Tema con variazioni: Andante. III. Intermezzo: Allegretto. IV. Andante maestoso. — Moderato maestoso. — Allegro moderato.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD.

The Instrument is a Steinertone.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES



ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, December 11, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
[illegible], Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

MARSCHNER.	OVERTURE, "Hans Heiling," op. 80.
ROBERT SCHUMANN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in A minor, op. 54. I. Allegro affettuoso. II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso. III. Allegro vivace.
BRAHMS.	THREE HUNGARIAN DANCES, Nos. 1, 2 and 6. I. Allegro molto. II. Allegretto. VI. Vivace. (Scored for ORCHESTRA by the COMPOSER and ALBERT PARLOW).
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 36. I. Adagio.—Allegro con brio. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Allegro.—Trio. IV. Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Mme ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Fifth Concert, Thursday evening, December 28.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 23, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE to the Legend, "Die schöne Melusine," op. 32.
MOZART.	ARIA, "L'Amero," from "Il re Pastore."
HUMPERDINCK.	MOORISH RHAPSODY. I. TARIFA. Elegie bei Sonnenaufgang: Langsam. II. TANGER. Eine Nacht im Mohren Café: Lebhaft. III. TETUAN. Ein Ritt in die Wüste: Mässig schnell. (First time at these Concerts.)
BELLINI.	ARIA, "Casta Diva," from "Norma."
WILHELM BERGER.	SYMPHONY, in B-flat major, op. 71. I. Lebhaft (Vivace). II. Sehr lebhaft (Molto vivace). III. Langsam (Andante). IV. Sehr lebhaft (Molto vivace). (First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

Mrs. MARIAN TITUS.

Fourth Concert, Thursday evening, December 7. Programme: Marschner, Overture, "Hans Heiling"; Schumann, Concerto for Pianoforte; Rontgen, Norwegian Ballad; Beethoven, Symphony No. 2. Soloist, Mme. Antoinette Szumowska.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, zum "Gefesselten Prometheus" von Aeschylos, op. 38.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in C minor. Allegro con brio. Largo. Rondo. Allegro.
J. S. BACH.	CHACONNE, in D minor. (Scored for ORCHESTRA by RAFF.)
GLAZOUNOFF.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in C minor, op. 58. I. Adagio. — Allegro passionato. II. Tema con variazioni: Andante. III. Intermezzo: Allegretto. IV. Andante maestoso. — Moderato maestoso — Allegro moderato.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD.

The Instrument is a Steinertone.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, December 11, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 7, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

MARSCHNER.	OVERTURE, "Hans Heiling," op. 80.
ROBERT SCHUMANN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in A minor, op. 54. I. Allegro affettuoso. II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso. III. Allegro vivace.
BRAHMS.	THREE HUNGARIAN DANCES, Nos. 1, 2 and 6. I. Allegro molto. II. Allegretto. VI. Vivace.

(Scored for ORCHESTRA by the COMPOSER and ALBERT PARLOW).

BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 36. I. Adagio.—Allegro con brio. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Allegro.—Trio. IV. Allegro molto.

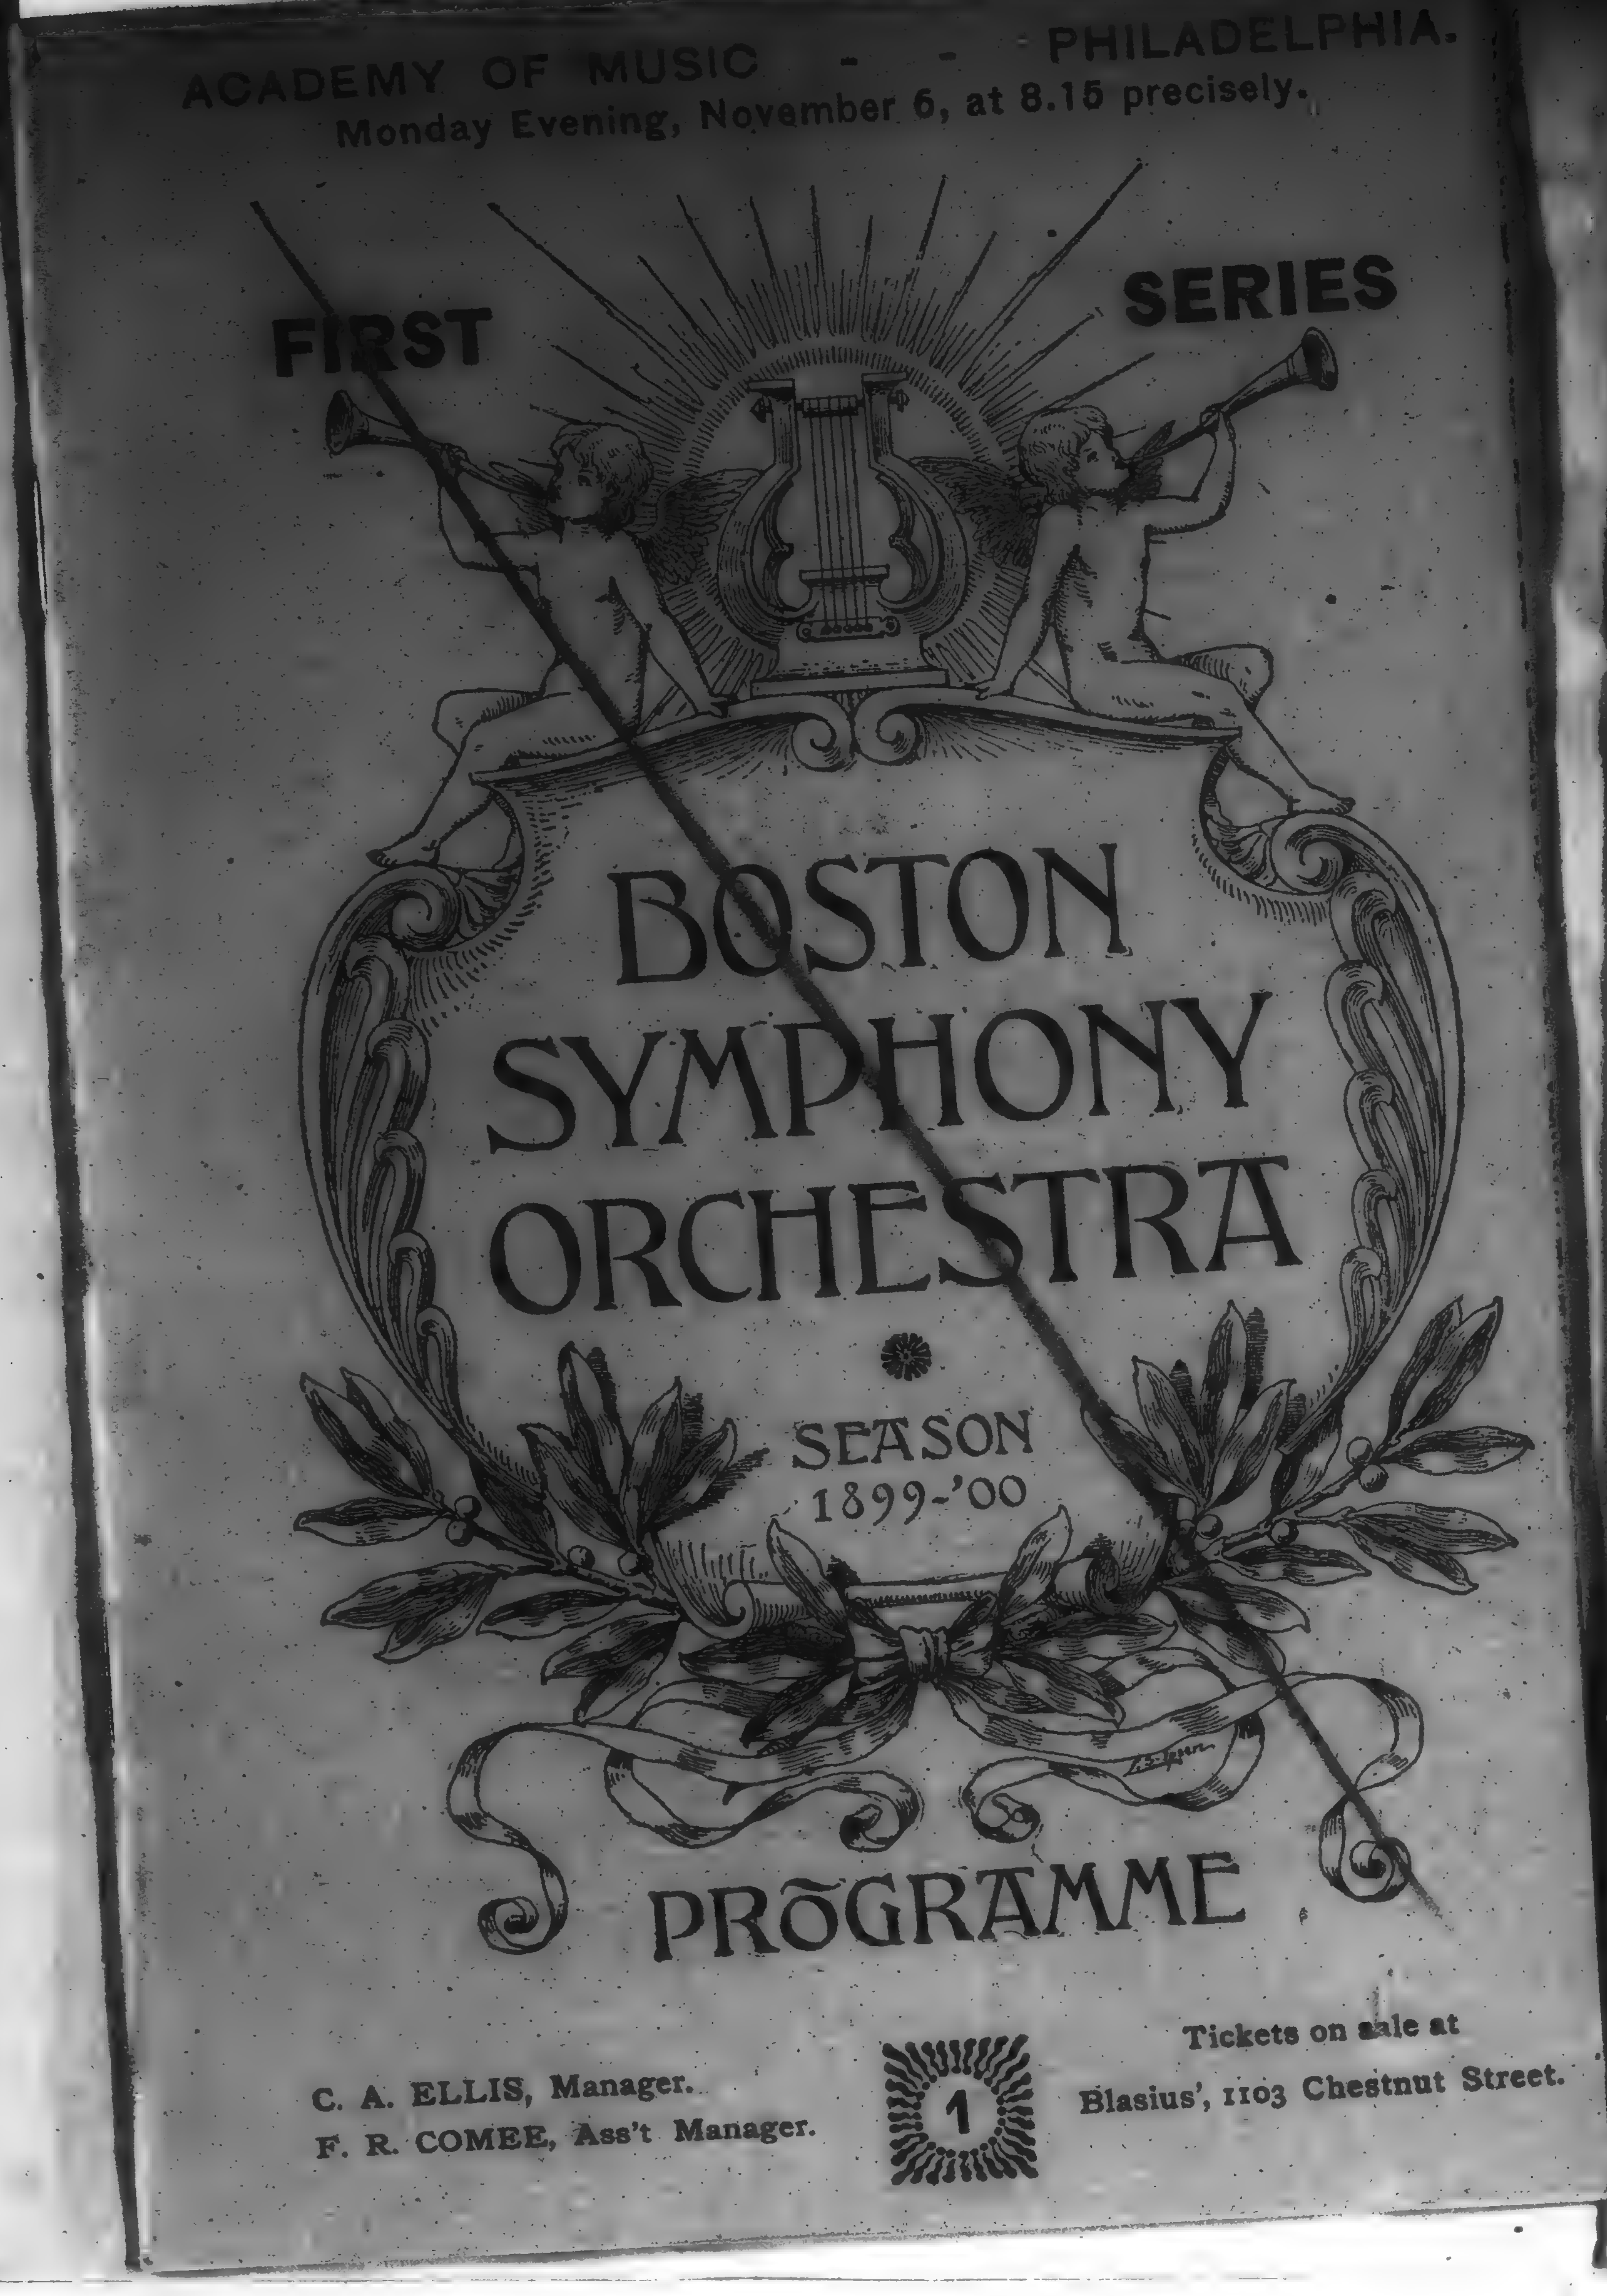
Soloist:

Mme ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA.

The Pianoforte is a Chickering.

Fifth Concert, Thursday evening, December 28.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES



ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, November 6, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

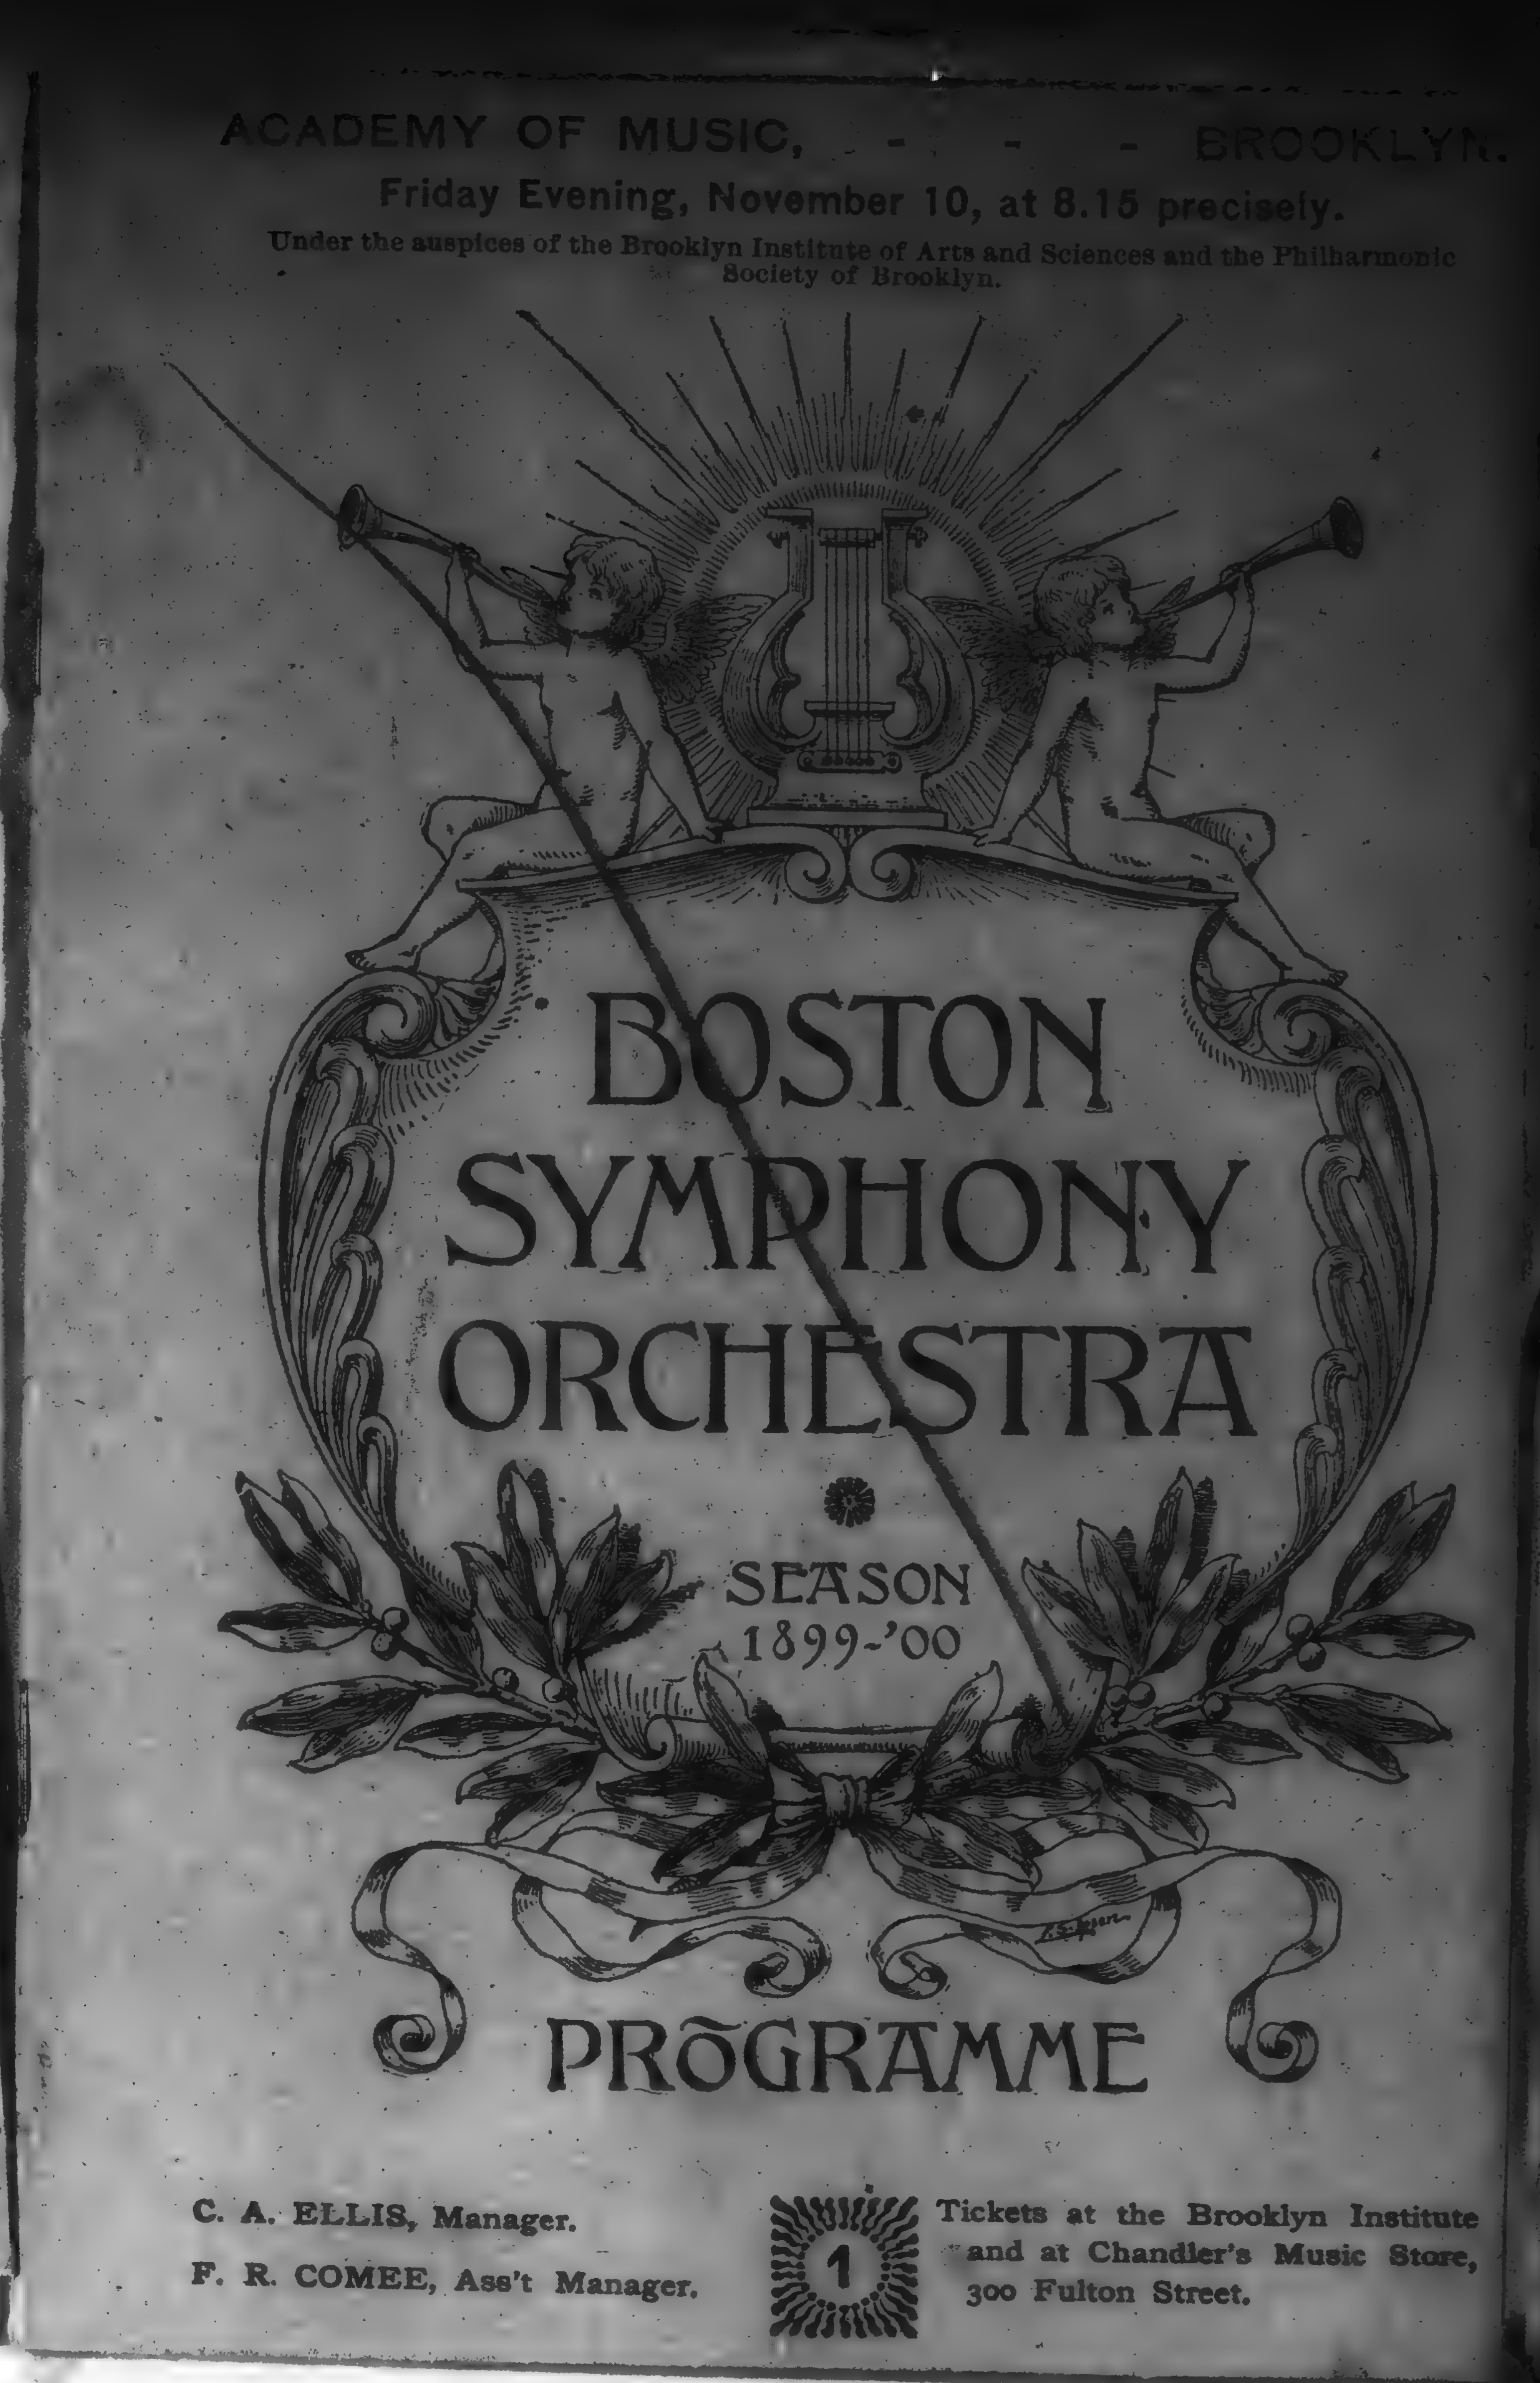
SEASON 1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.



ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - - BROOKLYN.
Friday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
BERLIOZ.	CASSANDRA'S ARIA, from Act I. of "Les Troyens."
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, for ORCHESTRA, op. 45.
WAGNER.	SONGS with PIANOFORTE: a) SCHMERZEN; b) TRAUME.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat major, opus 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Trio I. Molto più vivace.—Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

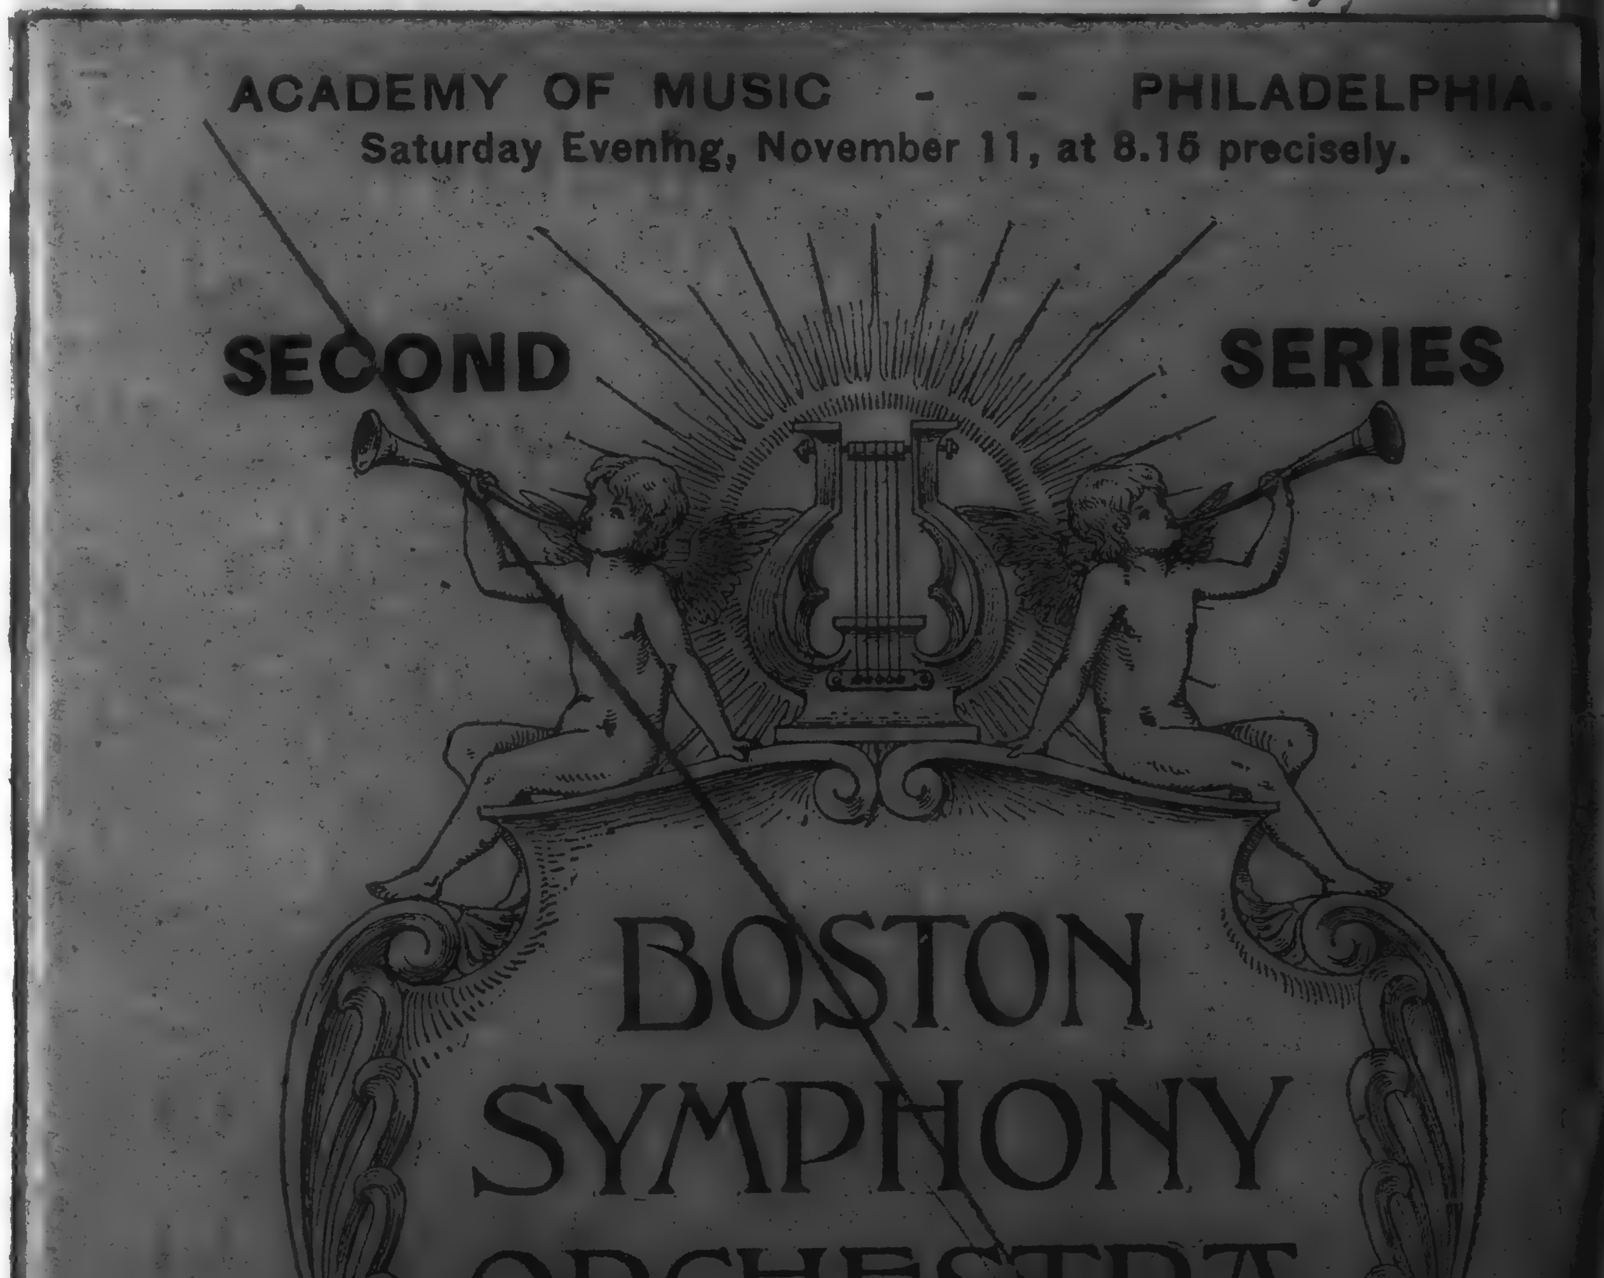
Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Chamber Concerts opens next Saturday, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

[118]



ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Saturday Evening, November 11, at 8.15 precisely.

SECOND SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

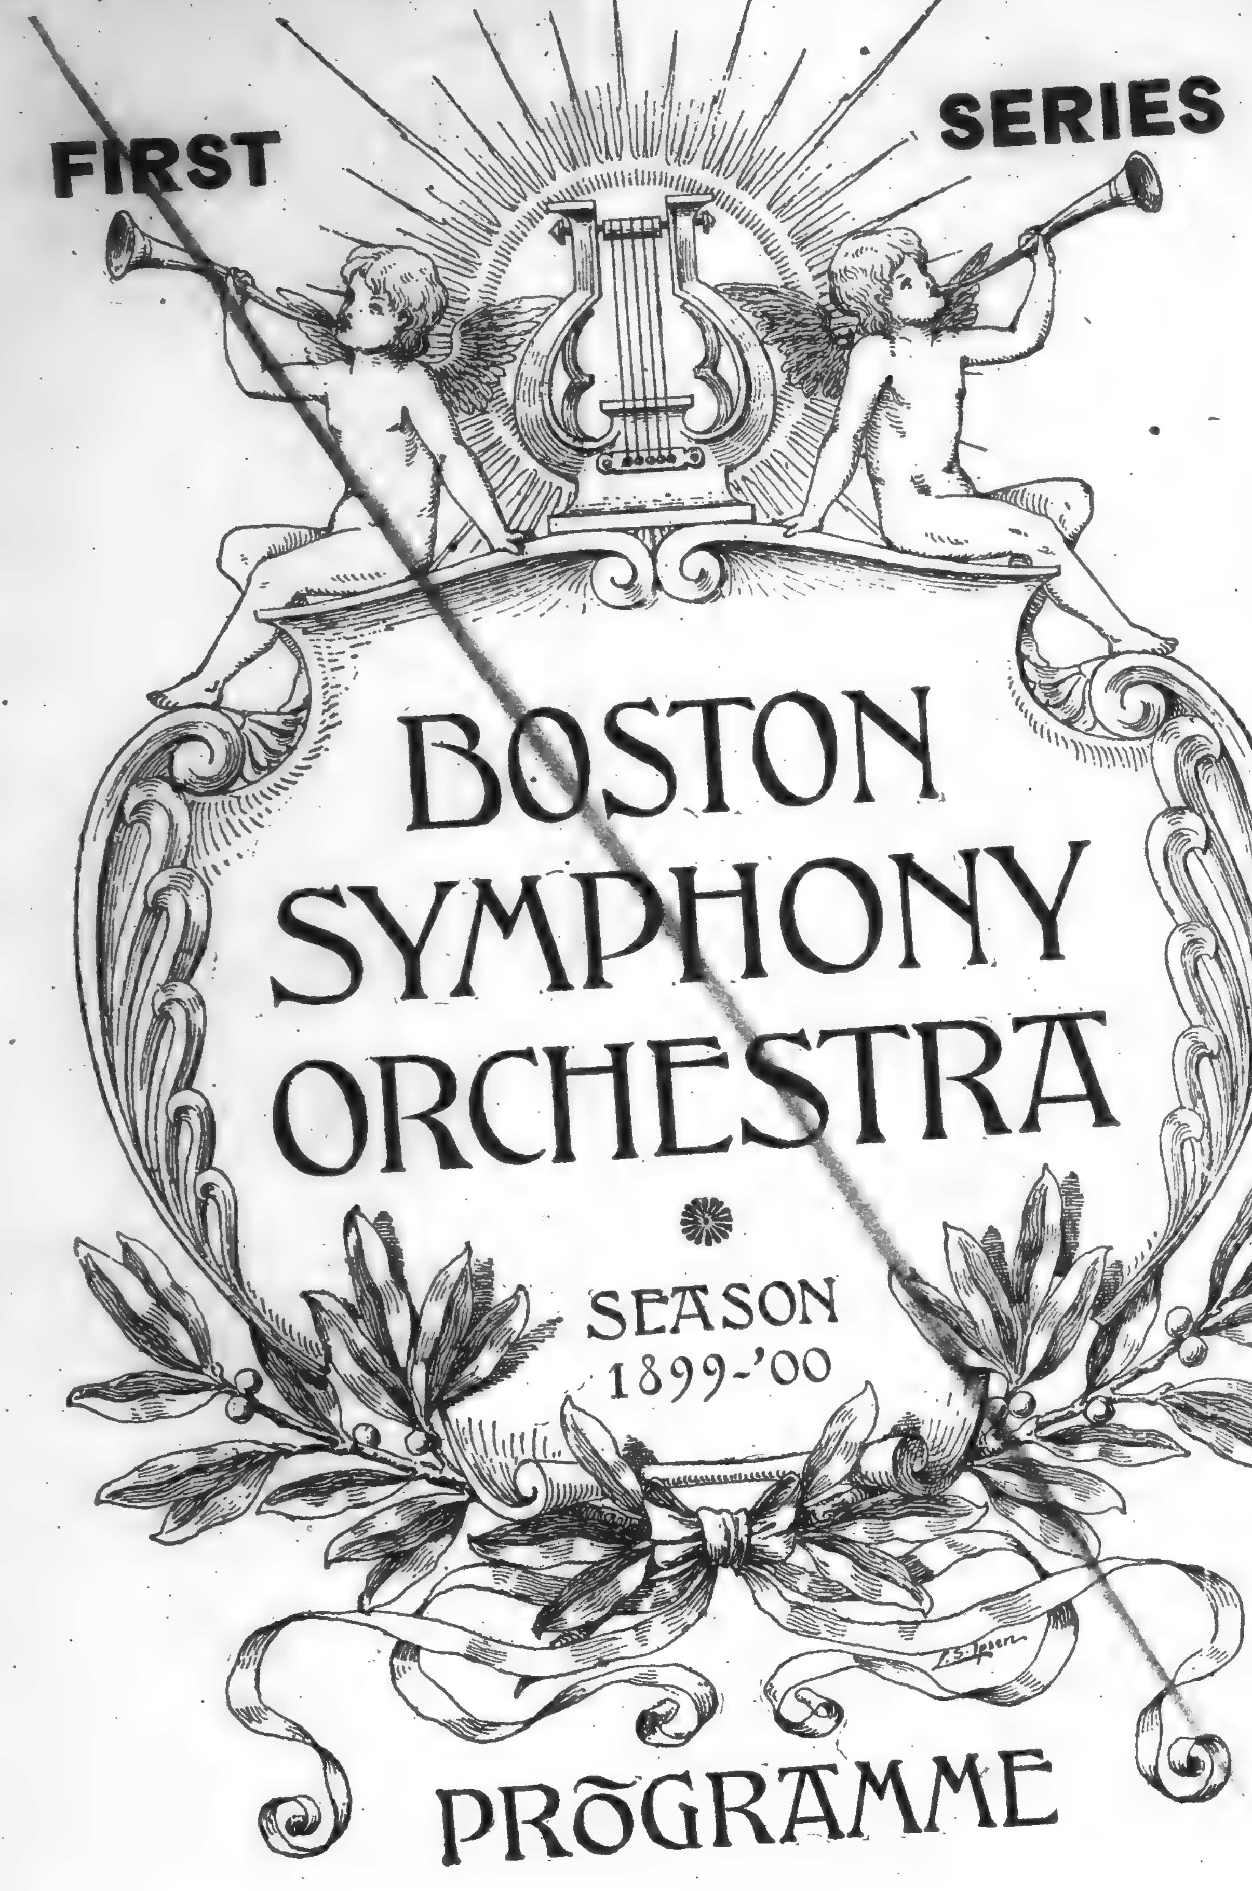
1

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Str

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, November 6, at 8.15 precisely.

FIRST SERIES



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - - BROOKLYN.
Friday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45. P.M.

Programme.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
BERLIOZ.	CASSANDRA'S ARIA, from Act I. of "Les Troyens."
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, for ORCHESTRA, op. 45.
WAGNER.	SONGS with PIANOFORTE: a) SCHMERZEN; b) TRAUME.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace. II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Trio I: Molto più vivace.—Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Chamber Concerts opens next Saturday, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC - - PHILADELPHIA.
Saturday Evening, November 11, at 8.15 precisely.

SECOND SERIES

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets on sale at
Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, November 15, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

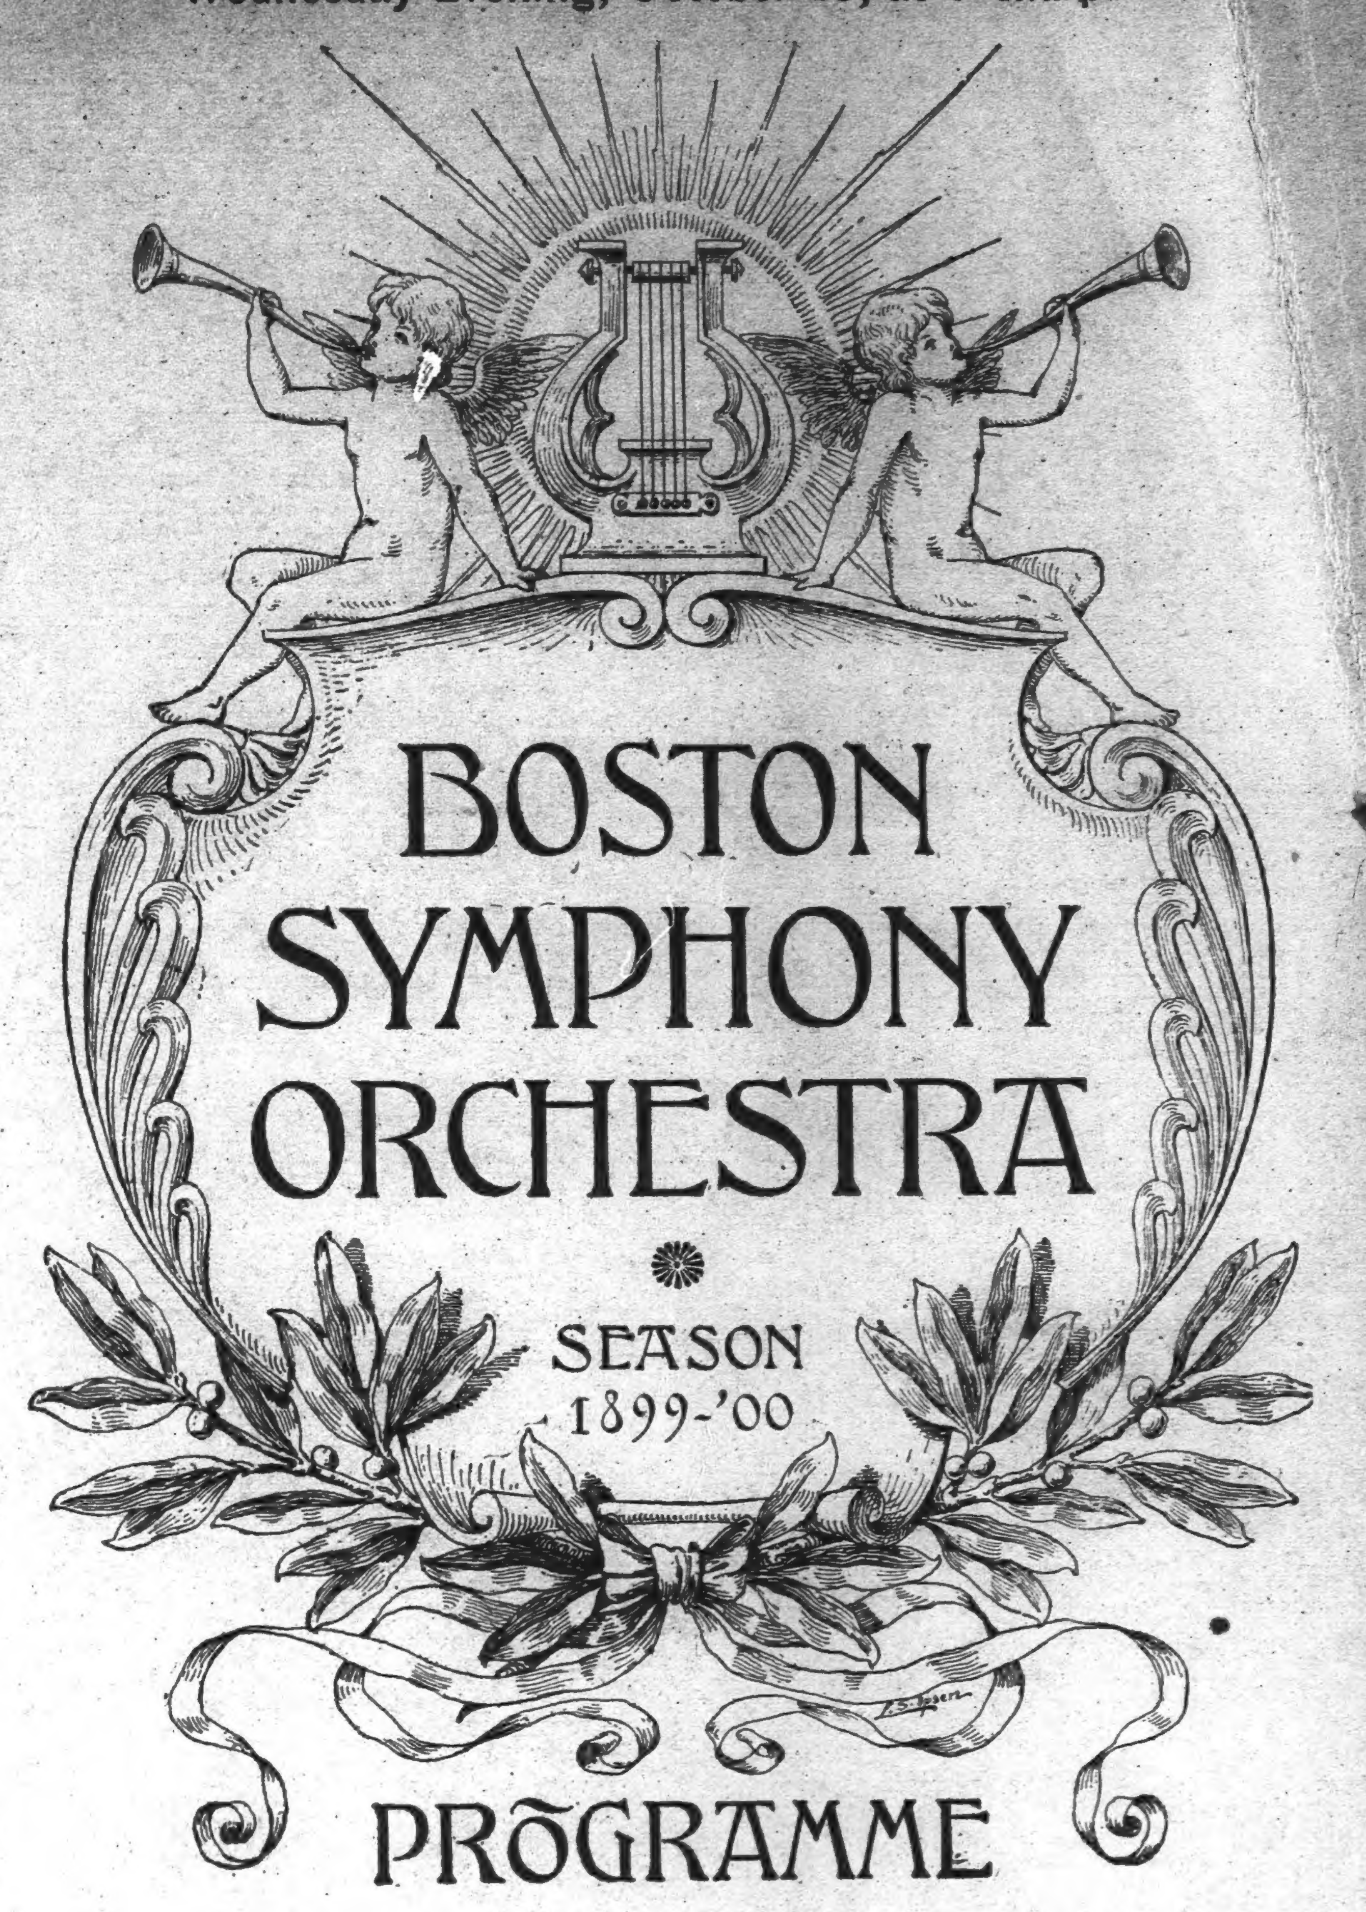
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Season tickets, at $7 for the eigh
concerts, and single tickets at $1.2
each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, October 25, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight
concerts, and single tickets at $1.25
each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, November 8, at 2.30 precisely.
Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

1

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE
Tuesday Evening, November 7, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1899-'00

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats,
sale at Albert's, 15 No. Charles S

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND